In the matter of orchestration, Mr. Loeffler evidently follows the most "advanced" recent French models; the color-effects he produces are almost invariably brilliant, sometimes new. Somehow we could not escape the impression last Saturday evening that in this first extended orchestral work of his, Mr. Loeffler suffers a little fr[illegible] [illegible] often [illegible] excesses, he [illegible] imagination, [illegible] and skill in his handling of the orchestra; but, to us, there was somewhat too much of everything—too much brass, too much percussion, too much harp, too much violin d'amour. Admit that the two viole d'amour parts are the principal ones in the work, solo parts, and that the work was in a measure written for them; ah! but, from a high point of view, that is an "überwundener Standpunkt," too; the time is past when a poetic composer could excuse himself on the ground of bringing any particular instrument into prominence. We fancy Mr. Loeffler would be the first to be shocked by having his symphonic poem set down as a "double concerto." Upon the whole, we much wish to hear this remarkable composition again—and more than once—for its questionable features seem to us to be no more than questionable, and, as with Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra," we cannot help feeling that there is a great deal more in it than meets the casual glance.

The viole d'amour parts were admirably, beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler himself. Of the revived old instruments we can say that their tone is singularly beautiful, but must own that we doubt if we should have "spotted" them had we not known them to be there. The performance by the orchestra was full of life and dash, but seemed to us to lack a good deal in the matters of finish and dynamic balance. We cannot help feeling that Mr. Loeffler's scoring can really sound better than that. The composer was very warmly received and recalled at the close Brahms's E minor symphony has been better played here before. The first two movements dragged terribly: the first, with elephantine deliberation; the second, with schoolgirl sentimentality. The third movement was given briskly and with all due spirit, but not particularly clearly. The great passacaglia finale went, however, wtih a grand sweep; only here, too, we have heard greater clearness and finish before.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68; Beethoven, romanza in F, for violin and orchestra, opus 50; Paganini, caprice in A minor (arrangement and orchestral accompaniment by Ladislas Gorski); Massenet, incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes;" Smetana, overture to "Prodana nevesta." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

[illegible]DAY, JAN[illegible]

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Symphony series was given in Infantry Hall last evening. There was, as usual, a large and attentive audience. The work of the orchestra was quite up to its well-known high standard and the soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, received quite an ovation for his finished and musicianly playing. If the orchestral numbers were greeted with something less than the usual display of enthusiasm, it was not because they were lacking in interest, but rather that they presented music of a quieter type than has been the rule with this season's programmes. The red fire and brazen clangor of the "moderns" seems to possess a pulse-quickening and hurrah-compelling power not found in the masterpieces of the great classicists. A liberal diet of this highly spiced musical food blunts the taste, and the plainer dishes, be they ever so attractively served, are partaken of with diminished appreciation. Audiences, no less than composers, show forth the modern tendency to exalt the sensuous side of music at the expense of that which appeals to the ear with pure tonal beauty and to the mind by perfection of musical form. Whether the final decision be that music's province is to minister to the senses, or to the intellect, or to both in equal measure, the trend of taste at the present day is significant and not to be ignored.

The programme for last night's concert included the following numbers:

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy..............
..................Overture to "Ruy Blas"
Pietro Locatelli.........Sonata for Violoncello
a. Allegro.
b. Adagio.
c. Manuetto con variazioni.
(Piano accompaniment arranged by Alfredo Piatti.)
Ludwig van Beethoven, Symphony No. 6,
...........in F-major, "Pastoral," Op. 68
I. The Awakening of Cheerful feelings on Arriving in the Country: Allegro ma non troppo (F-major)
II. Scene by the Brookside. Andante molto mosso (B-flat major)
III. Merry Meeting of Country Folk: Allegro (F-major)
IV. Thunderstorm, Tempest: Allegro (F-minor)
V. Shepherds' Song. Glad and Thankful Feelings after the Storm: Allegretto (F-major)
Bedrich Smetana.....................
............Overture to "The Sold Bride"

Mendelssohn's overture, written for a performance of Victor Hugo's drama of "Ruy Blas" given in aid of a local charity in Leipsic on March 11, 1839, is a fine example of his facility in composition. The work was written in three days, and, as Mr. Apthorp truly says, "is the only one of Mendelssohn's overtures which has completely the theatrical character, the closing measures of which make you feel that the curtain is about to rise." It is a brilliant piece of "hack work," but not on that account lacking in the true Mendelssohnian characteristics of melodiousness and elegant workmanship. It was played with admirable spirit and smoothness.

The so-called "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, while by no means one of the greatest of the nine, is interesting not only on account of inherent musical beauty; but also as the most distinct attempt at "programme music" by the greatest composer of symphonies. Like all other music of that description, it would scarcely convey to the listener the precise ideas of the composer without the addition of the explanatory titles to each movement. But the mind once turned in the proper direction the music becomes suggestive and appropriate. To be sure, anything that Beethoven wrote is perfectly capable of standing upright on its musical legs, but there is an added pleasure in following the unfolding of a musical story where the attempt is seriously made to tell one. Mr. Paur read the symphony sympathetically and the players seconded him with admirable skill. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride," the most brilliant number on the programme, brought the concert to a successful close, the strings being prominent in their display of finished virtuosity.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. He went back some distance in search of a novelty, for Locatelli, the composer of the sonata which he played, was born over 200 years ago. It is evident that there were virtuosos in those days, or the sonata must have remained unplayed, for it is decidedly formidable upon the technical side. Melodious, too, it is, in the somewhat stiff and formal style of the period, the adagio being especially charming. The last two movements were played by Mr. Schroeder at the concert given last week by the Kneisel Quartet. Both times he completely captivated his hearers by his easy mastery of technical difficulties, mellow tone and artistic rendering. He was enthusiastically applauded and forced to bow his acknowledgments again and again, and the ovation was thoroughly well deserved.

The fifth concert of the series will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 2.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 9.

The Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture "Ruy Blas"............Mendelssohn
Symphonic Poem "Death of Tintagcles,"..
(First time) C. M. Loeffler
Symphony, No. 4, E minor, op. 98....Brahms

The novelty was Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, a work claiming sincere admiration for the musicianly qualities that it displays, and for its sound workmanship. It is said to be "after the drama by M. Maeterlinck," but the connection is not easily revealed. The drama does not suggest the music and the music does not suggest the drama. In the music, for example, there is no hint that "il y regnait un tel silence qui un fruit mur qui tombait dans le parc appelait les visages aux fenetres," and the Queen who does not visibly appear at all in the drama seems to be the dominant element in the music, that is, if she be pictured by the bassons, trombones, bass tuba, bass clarinet, trumpets, kettle-drums, cymbals, bass-drum and tam-tam.

On first hearing, the music is puzzling; one cannot reach to the heart of it and follow its evolution in a manner that is wholly satisfying. The coloring is wonderfully varied, rich to the point of brilliancy, and of rare ingenuity, but what it is intended to represent is not clear. It deserves to be added, however, that Mr. Loeffler has done what he deliberately intended to do, and it is therefore unjust to criticise him from the viewpoint of a theory that he rejects. In Maeterlinck's work the Queen does not appear, but she dominates the entire drama, she deals out tragedy while we remain ignorant of her motives, and the tragedy is acted out behind an iron door, against which Ygraine breaks her fingers and bruises her hands in her vain efforts to open it, and her final expression of agony is "I spit!"

In Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem there is a similar deliberate vagueness; one feels that something tragic is happening, for although one is kept utterly in the dark, there are flashes as of lightning, dazzling to the eyes, and noises as of crashing thunder that peal ominously in the ears. One cannot see a tragedy in the blackness, but the shrieks, the groans and the wailings are suggestive, and if one has imagination he may ultimately guess at the outlines of a story that is not told.

It is probable that when one became more closely acquainted with the work its beauties will stand out in strong relief and one would better appreciate the climaxes that now seem ineffectual and better adjust his nerves to the perpetual strain on them. An immediate recognition and acceptance are an evidence of the conventional and not of the novel; one may readily understand Shakespeare, but one reaches to the heart of Maeterlinck's greatness only after much preparatory nibblings, cautious thought and careful weighings of opinions. The definite is easily recognized; the indefinite adapts itself to crystalization with great difficulty, and so it happens that a true impressionistic picture is a portrait, or landscape or a storm at sea, according to the point of view taken, and the mood of the spectator.

Mr. Loeffler is always interesting, and one acquainted with his talent feels sure that his work is of the best even when it is difficult of comprehension on first hearing. The symphonic poem, on its technical side, is of a very high quality, and, as has been already said, its tone coloring is brilliant and most fascinating. The program informs us that the work has "all the essential elements of the sonata form," and this demonstrates that Mr. Loeffler is still travelling along classic lines, and that his seeming defiance of the rules of tradition is an illusion rather than a reality. The work was interpreted in the most brilliant manner by Mr. Paur and his orchestra and won the enthusiastic approval of the critical audience.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, No. 6, Beethoven; Romanza in F, Beethoven; Caprice in A minor, Paginini; Suite, "Les Erinnyes," Massenet, first time; Overture, "The Sold Bride," Smetana.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1898.

The Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall tomorrow evening under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur. The program arranged is one that cannot fail to attract lovers of music including as it does such works as the Locatelli Sonata and the Beethoven Symphony No. 6. The soloist of the concert will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder the violioncellist who will be heard to special advantage in the Locatelli sonata.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 10, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eleventh Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows.

Mendelssohn: Overture to "Ruy Blas," opus 95.
C. M. Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlinck), for orchestra and two violes d'amour obbligate (MS.)
(First time.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98.

Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, which had not been heard at these concerts for years, was given what seemed to us a decidedly vulgar performance. Its Allegro molto began ponderously slow, was then whipped up to regulation speed with the crescendo of the conclusion-theme, and ended with a sauve-qui-peut rush. One seemed ever and anon to hear the crack of the ring-master's whip through it. The art of crescendo without accelerando seems well-nigh lost! The overture itself comes back wonderfully refreshed by its long sleep. How much genius, life and fertility of invention there is in this "occasional" composition, written in three days! The form is so simple and perspicuous, so desperately regular, that one would say that Mendelssohn had been writing an example of the sonata form for conservatory use; yet how natural, inspired and brilliant it all is! how every measure seems to fall into its place by the force of gravitation, as if no power, human or divine, could help its so falling!

Mr. Loeffler's new symphonic poem is a composition to give one pause. In the first place, it is in no true sense programme music; there is no part of it that recalls any particular scene or event in Maeterlinck's play; there is even one bit of realistic suggestion in it—the twelve strokes of midnight—of which there is no hint in the play at all. It is plainly nothing more than a piece of strongly emotional composition, inspired by reading an exciting and exceptionally powerful drama, and more traditionally regular in structure than might have been expected. If the two viole d'amour parts are taken as musical reflections of the characters of Tintagiles and Ygraine, they reflect these characters more by the fact of their being inseparable than by their specifically expressive quality. Still, from another point of view, the ideal connection between the symphonic poem and the drama may be said to be very strong indeed; instead of trying to describe, depict or suggest a given series of events or to paint living characters in tones, the music contents itself with vividly reflecting the psychical situation in the drama. We have on the one hand impetuous, cruel, ruthless violence; on the other, the most acute and unremitting nervous tension. Here is where Mr. Loeffler shows his fine poetic sense; he has found musical inspiration in Maeterlinck's play, and lets his music do just what, according to it own nature, as music, it can do best: reflect the psychical character of the emotional gist of the play.

Of the composition, considered simply as music, we have not very much to say yet; we have heard it but once, and its whole musical atmosphere is of a sort to which it takes some time to get acclimated. When a man who is naturally all nerves, who may be said to live habitually on the E-string of feeling, sets himself with malice prepense to paint a musical picture of high nervous tension, he may go to considerable lengths. In his previous compositions, notably in his later ones, Mr. Loeffler has shown plainly enough that the musical atmosphere his æsthetic lungs find most congenial is saturated with harmonic cross-relations; what Brahms has done in this field—and it was a curious coincidence, by the way, that Brahms's inveterately "querständig" E-minor symphony should have come on the same programme—what Brahms has done, we say, in this field sinks into insignificance beside Mr. Loeffler's deeds of daring. Francesca and Paolo, in Liszt's "Dante" symphony, do not quite get into that region of perpetual major thirds in which Mr. Loeffler's Tintagiles and Ygraine move and breathe. Of course, one may say that the old objection to the cross-relation of the tritone is now an "überwundener Standpunkt;" also, that no more vivid musical means of suggesting a mental state of high nervous tension exists than a succession of such cross-relations; all this may readily be admitted. Still the human ear remains the human ear; and, while it remains so, not even the sensuously beautiful tone of the viole d'amour can prevent such successions from acting upon it after a while like a sort of musical sandpaper. There is that in the intrinsic nature of music which makes it an unsafe art wherein to proceed to certain excesses. Not even the drama is so dangerous. You may paint a picture of some harrowing scene—say, of vivisection under aggravating nervous conditions—or show the vivid mimicry thereof on the stage; the spectator may be terrifically harrowed up mentally, but is physically safe. But, if you attempt anything of the sort in music, something very like and almost comparable to the physical operation is actually performed upon the listener; he suffers not merely from awakened sympathy, but actually participates in the torture. On the other hand, it can be said of music that what may be acoustically grating in it is often cured of its rasp by its specific musical coherency and meaning—not its expressive appositeness—becoming at length manifest; and this is why we are inclined to give Mr. Loeffler's harping on perpetual major thirds the benefit of the doubt. When, after repeated hearings of his symphonic poem, we shall have got to perceive clearly the true bearings of his unearthly modalities, to grasp the melodic essence of his "querständig" passages, and appreciate their harmonic logic, then may we feel very differently about them.

In the matter of orchestration, Mr. Loeffler evidently follows the most "advanced" recent French models; the color-effects he produces are almost invariably brilliant, sometimes new. Somehow we could not escape the impression last Saturday evening that in this first extended orchestral work of his, Mr. Loeffler suffers a little from that embarras de richesses which often leads beginners to excesses, he shows imagination, color-sense, and skill in his handling of the orchestra; but, to us, there was somewhat too much of everything—too much brass, too much percussion, too much harp, too much violin d'amour. Admit that the two viole d'amour parts are the principal ones in the work, solo parts, and that the work was in a measure written for them; ah! but, from a high point of view, that is an "überwundener Standpunkt," too; the time is past when a poetic composer could excuse himself on the ground of bringing any particular instrument into prominence. We fancy Mr. Loeffler would be the first to be shocked by having his symphonic poem set down as a "double concerto." Upon the whole, we much wish to hear this remarkable composition again—and more than once—for its questionable features seem to us to be no more than questionable, and, as with Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra," we cannot help feeling that there is a great deal more in it than meets the casual glance.

The viole d'amour parts were admirably, beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Loeffler himself. Of the revived old instruments we can say that their tone is singularly beautiful, but must own that we doubt if we should have "spotted" them had we not known them to be there. The performance by the orchestra was full of life and dash, but seemed to us to lack a good deal in the matters of finish and dynamic balance. We cannot help feeling that Mr. Loeffler's scoring can really sound better than that. The composer was very warmly received and recalled at the close Brahms's E minor symphony has been better played here before. The first two movements dragged terribly: the first, with elephantine deliberation; the second, with schoolgirl sentimentality. The third movement was given briskly and with all due spirit, but not particularly clearly. The great passacaglia finale went, however, wtih a grand sweep; only here, too, we have heard greater clearness and finish before.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68; Beethoven, romanza in F, for violin and orchestra, opus 50; Paganini, caprice in A minor (arrangement and orchestral accompaniment by Ladislas Gorski); Massenet, incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes;" Smetana, overture to "Prodana nevesta." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Symphony series was given in Infantry Hall last evening. There was, as usual, a large and attentive audience. The work of the orchestra was quite up to its well-known high standard and the soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, received quite an ovation for his finished and musicanly playing. If the orchestral numbers were greeted with something less than the usual display of enthusiasm, it was not because they were lacking in interest, but rather that they presented music of a quieter type than has been the rule with this season's programmes. The red fire and brazen clangor of the "moderns" seems to possess a pulse-quickening and hurrah-compelling power not found in the masterpieces of the great classicists. A liberal diet of this highly spiced musical food blunts the taste, and the plainer dishes, be they ever so attractively served, are partaken of with diminished appreciation. Audiences, no less than composers, show forth the modern tendency to exalt the sensuous side of music at the expense of that which appeals to the ear with pure tonal beauty and to the mind by perfection of musical form. Whether the final decision be that music's province is to minister to the senses, or to the intellect, or to both in equal measure, the trend of taste at the present day is significant and not to be ignored.

The programme for last night's concert included the following numbers:

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy...............
..................Overture to "Ruy Blas"
Pietro Locatelli.........Sonata for Violoncello
a. Allegro.
b. Adagio.
c. Manuetto con variazioni.
(Piano accompaniment arranged by Alfredo Piatti.)
Ludwig van Beethoven, Symphony No. 6,
............In F-major, "Pastoral," Op. 68
I. The Awakening of Cheerful feelings on Arriving in the Country: Allegro ma non troppo (F-major)
II. Scene by the Brookside, Andante molto mosso (B-flat major)
III. Merry Meeting of Country Folk: Allegro (F-major)
IV. Thunderstorm, Tempest: Allegro (F-minor)
V. Shepherds' Song, Glad and Thankful Feelings after the Storm: Allegretto (F-major)
Bedrich Smetana.........................
............Overture to "The Sold Bride"

Mendelssohn's overture, written for a performance of Victor Hugo's drama of "Ruy Blas" given in aid of a local charity in Leipsic on March 11, 1839, is a fine example of his facility in composition. The work was written in three days, and, as Mr. Apthorp truly says, "is the only one of Mendelssohn's overtures which has completely the theatrical character, the closing measures of which make you feel that the curtain is about to rise." It is a brilliant piece of "hack work," but not on that account lacking in the true Mendelssohnian characteristics of melodiousness and elegant workmanship. It was played with admirable spirit and smoothness.

The so-called "Pastoral" symphony of Beethoven, while by no means one of the greatest of the nine, is interesting not only on account of inherent musical worth, but also as the most distinct example of "programme music" by the greatest composer of symphonies. Like all other music of that description, it would scarcely convey to the listener the precise ideas of the composer without the addition of the explanatory titles to each movement. But the mind once turned in the proper direction the music becomes suggestive and appropriate. To be sure, anything that Beethoven wrote is perfectly capable of standing upright on its musical legs, but there is an added pleasure in following the unfolding of a musical story where the attempt is seriously made to tell one. Mr. Paur read the symphony sympathetically and the players seconded him with admirable skill. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride," the most brilliant number on the programme, brought the concert to a successful close, the strings being prominent in their display of finished virtuosity.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist. He went back some distance in search of a novelty, for Locatelli, the composer of the sonata which he played, was born over 200 years ago. It is evident that there were virtuosos in those days, or the sonata must have remained unplayed, for it is decidedly formidable upon the technical side. Melodious, too, it is, in the somewhat stiff and formal style of the period, the adagio being especially charming. The last two movements were played by Mr. Schroeder at the concert given last week by the Kneisel Quartet. Both times he completely captivated his hearers by his easy mastery of technical difficulties, mellow tone and artistic rendering. He was enthusiastically applauded and forced to bow his acknowledgments again and again, and the ovation was thoroughly well deserved.

The fifth concert of the series will be given on the evening of Wednesday, Feb. 2.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1898.

PITTSBURG ORCHESTRA PROTESTS.

THERE is trouble in the Pittsburg Orchestra. Three of its men have already left, the first violin, first 'cello and another, and the remainder of the ranks are reported to be in a seething condition of discontent.

Now we will preface the story of the case by stating that our sympathies in this matter lie all with the men, and our idea is that it is a great pity the inescapable question of bread and butter did not enable the entire organization to make one irrevocable strike. The Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra was called upon to play in an operatic performance of the "Barber of Seville," with Melba, on Monday evening, January 3, in the Pittsburg Carnegie Music Hall. The opera required three rehearsals, which, with the evening performance, were demanded from the men by the orchestra board of managers without payment. The Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company did not propose to go to the expense of transporting its orchestra to Pittsburg. It is, of course, understood that the Pittsburg board of management received certain financial acknowledgment, but not nearly sufficient to offer any just compensation to the men, if division were made, and no more than a small fraction of the amount it would have cost the Damrosch-Ellis Company to move its own organiation.

When the announcement was made the Pittsburg Symphony men raised a howl of revolt. Three of the most independent spokesmen were promptly discharged. They voiced the rights of the band too logically and accurately and their presence was dangerous. This body of men did not object to play because of hard work and no extra payment. The men objected because they are members of a permanent organization, the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, and were called on for an operatic performance. Their contract binds them to play at all "concerts" the managers arrange for during their engagement without any extra compensation. But an operatic performance is not a "concert," the musicians say, and they are right. The extra "concerts" in which they might be assumed to play would be on a musical par with their symphony work. Opera at its strongest and best means a different field of labor, but when it comes to the mere accompaniment of a "star" in a work like the "Barber of Seville" the situation is too absurdly trivial and undignified for seriously minded musicians. No man worthy a place in a permanent symphonic body should care to involve his prestige by willing response to an incidental Italian opera call.

In resenting the imposition the men were true not alone to the spirit but even the letter of their contract. Pity it was, we repeat, that a matter of dependence should disable men against practical defense of their principles. Not only had the band to hold together with three new men to replace the three left, and to play at the Pittsburg opera, but many of its men [illegible] had to go to Cleveland on the 5th and repeat the Damrosch-Ellis work in opera there. From such indications there is no telling where the permanent Symphony Orchestra of Pittsburg may wind up. There are several comic opera companies on the road, and it need not be surprising if Pittsburg's band be put in harness with one or other before long "by order of the board."

For where is the line to be drawn? This opera precedent established by the board may dissolve through any number of stages until it reaches the promenade pier or the dinner dance. So long as a board of management has not the artistic feeling or discretion to follow the rule defined in dignified practice by every model symphonic body, what guarantee have the players in future as to what may be asked of them? Already the Pittsburg men have been forced to take the first false step and the conditions which compelled them here may do so to any point of decadence should the management insist. These men knew it was a false step and revolted, but they had to take it and their injury and disappointment are about equal. Naturally when they enlisted in these ranks under the symphony banner they relied on the unwritten law which forbids musicians of any permanent orchestra to appear in random or irregular performances and based their security on the observance of what Carlyle has sanely styled "the majesty of custom."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the leader of all musical organizations in this country, is simultaneously a type of that rigorous etiquette on the score of public performance which will be found to govern every symphonic body laying just claim to consistency and dignified repute. Its plan of tactics, inflexibly observed, is exactly the plan which the Pittsburg orchestra sought to maintain, but they got no further than theory. Again we say "the pity of it!" that these men could not afford to adhere to their principles and let contracts and Rossini opera go begging.

Who would not open his eyes and lose his artistic faith to see Boston's permanent band loom up in any operatic scheme or perform a tittle of orchestral work under any auspices save those designed by their own symphonic conductor? No such condition of things would be permitted by Mr. Paur for a moment, nor would the Boston Symphony leader tolerate that his band should appear en masse under any other conductor. Separate members of this or of other bands are at liberty to engage in any musical enterprise on their own account which will not interfere with their work at home and on tour, but these offshoot undertakings, all invariably on a plane of musical importance in keeping with the scheme of the orchestra from which they spring, and serve ordinarily to bring into more intimate public appreciation the merits of some of its leading members. The Kneisel Quartet is a felicitous case, representing at close range the finished detail of the Boston Symphony's leading string musicians. The Bradsky String Quartet, in days gone by, represented the New York Symphony Orchestra in the same manner, and the Thomas orchestra sanctions an independent quartet, while the list might be multiplied to a length needless to note here. This is legitimate and serves substantially a double purpose.

But imagine Mr. Kneisel—in the heart of the season too—sitting at his concert-master's desk, leading the band in an accompaniment to Melba's Rosina, Camille or Lucia! No, no. Let us thrust the impossible vision aside. Consistency thou art yet a jewel, starring the crown of many an orchestral body, even though Pittsburg may have rashly ignored your precious beauty and your virtue.

We extend our sympathies to the Pittsburg musicians, and trust that the board of management may repent it of its ways, and fashion a new code of tactics worthy of an enduring Symphony organization.

NOT alone did the Philharmonic Society make a mistake in placing a ridiculous composition—or de-composition—by Siegfried Wagner on the program of its last concert, but it also pushed forward a solo violinist who had no business to be there—Henri Marteau.

If the supposed standard of these affairs is to be maintained—we say "supposed standard," for it is all in the air and exists only in the minds of its directors—first class solo performers must be secured, else the whole scheme will tumble earthward. The audiences of the Philharmonic Society are composed of persons who go to listen to the soloists. The band by itself could not draw half a house, and if the soloists are mediocre, why then all the worse for the Philharmonic Society.

Marteau, when he was a pretty boy, excited some attention, but he is a man now and must be estimated by mature standards. He does not play well enough for a serious symphonic concert, and his cool reception Saturday night was natural. The Boston Symphony Orchestra can give a concert and pick the soloist from its own ranks; but then the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a real orchestra, while the Philharmonic Society is not; only an ocasional band that never rehearses, and consequently never plays well.

Emanating from a stand taken by THE MUSICAL COURIER the decision has been made to open the amphitheatre of the Academy of Music at the matinée performances of the Boston Symphony at 25 cents, for the benefit of students who are spending a great deal of money on a musical education. It is to be hoped that the teachers will urge upon their pupils the absolute necessity of attending these concerts. The teacher carries a certain amount of influence, and it now lies with him to bring his pupil into the habit of hearing the best music available in the United States or Europe at 25 cents. Those living in the Manhattan Borough will not be excluded, and this should be of as much interest to the New York teachers as to those of Brooklyn. The following splendid programs will be given:

FRIDAY MATINEE PROGRAM, JANUARY 21, AT 3 O'CLOCK.

Symphony, No. 46, in D major (without minuet)..Mozart
Solo Number..........................To be announced
Madame Szumowska, soloist.
Midsummer Night's Dream music..........Mendelssohn
Prize Song from Die Meistersingers...........Wagner
Evan Williams, soloist.
Overture to Tannhäuser.......................Wagner

SATURDAY EVENING PROGRAM, JANUARY 22, AT 8:15.

Overture, Leonore No. 3.....................Beethoven
Solo Number..........................To be announced
Madame Gadski, soloist.
Suite, Les Erinnyes (first time)...............Massenet
Solo Number..........................To be announced
Madame Gadski, soloist.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4...............Schumann

The Kaltenborn-Beyer-Hané string organization, to give the last chamber music concert of the series on Wednesday night, have been remarkably successful in their Cres-

---

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Delighted Audience Listened to a Fine Program.

Mr. Schroeder's Solo Performance One of the Special Features.

Probably the major portion of the large audience in Infantry hall last evening will be perfectly satisfied in the "pale realm of shade" if the quality of the music of the angel chorus proves as good as the harmony produced by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Certainly there was little or nothing left out of the cup of satisfaction tipped to the brim by an eager, enthusiastic and receptive company at the fourth concert of this magnificent ensemble of musicians last evening. When the inspiring, impelling energy of a great conductor like Emil Paur is associated with tone producers all fit to be soloists in bands of less fame than this one, which is conceded to be peerless, great things are expected, and great things are always accomplished. Of the many concerts given by the orchestra in this city, probably a number of patrons will agree that this one has not been surpassed by any of the others in music-filling qualities. There was a sense of consummate satisfaction at the product of the evening when the last note trembled away into silence, and desire seemed to have touched its pinnacle.

The program, which opened and closed with brilliant overtures, with magnificent 'cello playing by Alwin Schroeder and Beethoven's noble pastoral symphony in between, was as follows:

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, overture to "Ruy Blas."

Pietro Locatelli, sonata for violoncello.
(a) Allegro.
(b) Adagio.
(c) Menuetto con variazioni.

Piano accompaniment arranged by Alfredo Piatti.

Ludwig van Beethoven, Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," op. 68.

I. The awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country: allegro ma non troppo, F major, 2-4.

II. Scene by the brookside. Andante molto mosso, B-flat major, 12-8.

III. Merry meeting of country folk; allegro, F major, 3-4.

IV. Thunderstorm, tempest; allegro, F minor, 4-4.

V. Shepherds' song. Glad and thankful feelings after storm; allegretto, F major, 6-8.

Bedrich Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride."

The opening overture, and this is said advisedly, because at its conclusion the listener felt it was time for the curtain to go up on the theatricals which had been introduced by the music, was played in the brilliant and precise manner characteristic of this orchestra. In the hands of less accomplished players it would not have sharpened the appetite for the feast that followed, but its interpretation on this occasion was brilliant and peculiarly enjoyable. It has many of the trimmings of so-called modern music, inasmuch as it combines physical and tone energy. It suggests sensation and caters to popular rather than to discriminating taste. Its author was never much in love with it, and he called it the overture to the theatrical fund, because it was written for a performance of the drama "Ruy Blas," given for a benefit at Leipsig in March, 1839. It is primed with crescendo and peppered and salted with dramatics. It takes small effort for the imagination to conjure what the big orchestra did with it. Indeed the author would have probably acquiesced in the opinion that his music had been interpreted in the spirit of its writing.

The ovation bestowed upon Mr. Schroeder after his solo was as much of a compliment to the audience as it was to the matchless player. The demonstration betokened that there was a large number of music lovers in the great auditorium, and that they were not present because it was the thing—something fashionable, you know—but because they were disciples, more or less humble, of the divine art. That 'cello playing was a rare treat. No instrumentalist is prepared to dispute the place accorded Mr. Schroeder. He is reputed to be the most accomplishd player of this instrument on this continent, and without a peer in the world. After his

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1898.

PITTSBURG ORCHESTRA PROTESTS.

[illegible] trouble in the Pittsburg Orchestra. [illegible] of its [illegible] have already left, the first violin, [illegible] 'cello and another, and the remainder of the [illegible] are reported to be in a seething condition [illegible]onten[illegible].

No [illegible] will [illegible] the story of the case by stat[illegible] our sympathies in this matter lie all with [illegible] idea is that it is a great pity the [illegible] question of bread and butter did not enable [illegible] organization to make one irrevocable [illegible]. The Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra [illegible] play in an operatic performance [illegible] Seville," with Melba, on Monday evening [illegible] 3, in the Pittsburg Carnegie [illegible] opera required three rehearsals [illegible] the evening performance, were [illegible] from the men by the orchestra board [illegible] without payment. The Damrosch-Ellis [illegible] Company did not propose to go to the expense of [illegible]ting its orchestra to Pittsburg. [illegible] understood that the Pittsburg board of management received certain financial acknowledgment, but not nearly sufficient to offer any just compensation [illegible] the men, if division were made, and [illegible] more than a small fraction of the amount it would [illegible] cost the Damrosch-Ellis Company to move its own organiation.

When the announcement was made the Pittsburg Symphony men raised [illegible] of revolt. Three of the most independent spokesmen were promptly discharged. They voiced the rights of the band too logically and accurately and their presence was dangerous. This body of men did not object to play because of hard work and no extra payment. The men objected because they are members of a permanent organization, the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, and were called on for an operatic performance. Their contract binds them to play at all "concerts" the managers arrange for during their engagement without any extra compensation. But an operatic performance is not a "concert," the musicians say, and [illegible] right. The extra "concert[illegible] [illegible] might be assumed to play would be [illegible] par with their symphony work. Opera at its [illegible]gest and best means a different field of labor, but when it comes to the mere accompaniment [illegible] "star" in a work like the "Barber [illegible] the situation is too absurdly trivial [illegible] seriously minded musicians. [illegible] a place in a permanent symphony [illegible] should [illegible] involve his prestige by [illegible] incidental Italian opera call.

[illegible] on the men were true not [illegible] spirit [illegible] the letter of their contract [illegible] it [illegible] that a matter of [illegible] men against practical [illegible] principle [illegible] Not only had the band [illegible] other [illegible] new men to replace [illegible] the Pittsburg opera, [illegible] to go to Cleveland [illegible] Damrosch-Ellis work in opera [illegible] indications there is no telling [illegible] Symphony Orchestra of Pittsburg may [illegible] there are several comic opera companies on the road and it need not be [illegible] Pittsburg [illegible] be put in harness [illegible] or other before long by order of the board.

For where is the line [illegible] drawn? This opera precedent established by the board may dissolve through [illegible] number of stages until it reaches the promenade [illegible] or the dinner dance. So long as a board of management has not the artistic feeling or disposition to follow the rule defined in dignified practice by every model symphonic body, what guarantee have the players in future as to what may be asked of them? Already the Pittsburg men have been forced to take the first false step and the conditions which compelled them here may do so to any point of decadence should the management insist. These men knew it was a false step and revolted, but they had to take it and their injury and disappointment are about equal. Naturally when they enlisted in these ranks under the symphony banner they relied on the unwritten law which forbids musicians of any permanent orchestra to appear in random or irregular performances and based their security on the observance of what Carlyle has sanely styled "the majesty of custom."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the leader of all musical organizations in this country, is simultaneously a type of that rigorous etiquette on the score of public performance which will be found to govern every symphonic body laying just claim to consistency and dignified repute. Its plan of tactics, inflexibly observed, is exactly the plan which the Pittsburg orchestra sought to maintain, but they got no further than theory. Again we say "the pity of it!" that these men could not afford to adhere to their principles and let contracts and Rossini opera go begging.

Who would not open his eyes and lose his artistic faith to see Boston's permanent band loom up in any operatic scheme or perform a tittle of orchestral work under any auspices save those designed by their own symphonic conductor? No such condition of things would be permitted by Mr. Paur for a moment, nor would the Boston Symphony leader tolerate that his band should appear en masse under any other conductor. Separate members of this or of other bands are at liberty to engage in any musical enterprise on their own account which will not interfere with their work at home and on tour, but these offshoot undertakings, all invariably on a plane of musical importance in keeping with the scheme of the orchestra from which they spring, and serve ordinarily to bring into more intimate public appreciation the merits of some of its leading members. The Kneisel Quartet is a felicitous case, representing at close range the finished detail of the Boston Symphony's leading string musicians. The Bradsky String Quartet, in days gone by, represented the New York Symphony Orchestra in the same manner, and the Thomas orchestra sanctions an independent quartet, while the list might be multiplied to a length needless to note here. This is legitimate and serves substantially a double purpose.

But imagine Mr. Kneisel—in the heart of the season too—sitting at his concert-master's desk, leading the band in an accompaniment to Melba's Rosina, Camille or Lucia! No, no. Let us thrust the impossible vision aside. Consistency thou art yet a jewel, starring the crown of many an orchestral body, even though Pittsburg may have rashly ignored your precious beauty and your virtue.

We extend our sympathies to the Pittsburg musicians, and trust that the board of management may repent it of its ways, and fashion a new code of tactics worthy of an enduring Symphony organization.

NOT alone did the Philharmonic Society make a mistake in placing a ridiculous composition—or de-composition—by Siegfried Wagner on the program of its last concert, but it also pushed forward a solo violinist who had no business to be there—Henri Marteau.

If the supposed standard of these affairs is to be maintained—we say "supposed standard," for it is all in the air and exists only in the minds of its directors—first class solo performers must be secured, else the whole scheme will tumble earthward. The audiences of the Philharmonic Society are composed of persons who go to listen to the soloists. The band by itself could not draw half a house, and if the soloists are mediocre, why then all the worse for the Philharmonic Society.

Marteau, when he was a pretty boy, excited some attention, but he is a man now and must be estimated by mature standards. He does not play well enough for a serious symphonic concert, and his cool reception Saturday night was natural. The Boston Symphony Orchestra can give a concert and pick the soloist from its own ranks; but then the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a real orchestra, while the Philharmonic Society is not; only an ocasional band that never rehearses, and consequently never plays well.

Emanating from a stand taken by THE MUSICAL COURIER the decision has been made to open the amphitheatre of the Academy of Music at the matinée performances of the Boston Symphony at 25 cents, for the benefit of students who are spending a great deal of money on a musical education. It is to be hoped that the teachers will urge upon their pupils the absolute necessity of attending these concerts. The teacher carries a certain amount of influence, and it now lies with him to bring his pupil into the habit of hearing the best music available in the United States or Europe at 25 cents. Those living in the Manhattan Borough will not be excluded, and this should be of as much interest to the New York teachers as to those of Brooklyn. The following splendid programs will be given:

FRIDAY MATINEE PROGRAM, JANUARY 21, AT 3 O'CLOCK.

Symphony, No. 46, in D major (without minuet)..Mozart
Solo Number........................To be announced
Madame Szumowska, soloist.
Midsummer Night's Dream music..........Mendelssohn
Prize Song from Die Meistersingers............Wagner
Evan Williams, soloist.
Overture to Tannhäuser.......................Wagner

SATURDAY EVENING PROGRAM, JANUARY 22, AT 8:15.

Overture, Leonore No. 3......................Beethoven
Solo Number..........................To be announced
Madame Gadski, soloist.
Suite, Les Erinnyes (first time)...............Massenet
Solo Number..........................To be announced
Madame Gadski, soloist.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4...............Schumann

The Kaltenborn-Beyer-Hané string organization, to give the last chamber music concert of the series on Wednesday night, have been remarkably successful in their Cres-

---

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 13, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Delighted Audience Listened to a Fine Program.

Mr. Schroeder's Solo Performance One of the Special Features.

Probably the major portion of the large audience in Infantry hall last evening will be perfectly satisfied in the "pale realm of shade" if the quality of the music of the angel chorus proves as good as the harmony produced by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Certainly there was little or nothing left out of the cup of satisfaction tipped to the brim by an eager, enthusiastic and receptive company at the fourth concert of this magnificent ensemble of musicians last evening. When the inspiring, impelling energy of a great conductor like Emil Paur is associated with tone producers all fit to be soloists in bands of less fame than this one, which is conceded to be peerless, great things are expected, and great things are always accomplished. Of the many concerts given by the orchestra in this city, probably a number of patrons will agree that this one has not been surpassed by any of the others in music-filling qualities. There was a sense of consummate satisfaction at the product of the evening when the last note trembled away into silence, and desire seemed to have touched its pinnacle.

The program, which opened and closed with brilliant overtures, with magnificent 'cello playing by Alwin Schroeder and Beethoven's noble pastoral symphony in between, was as follows:

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, overture to "Ruy Blas."

Pietro Locatelli, sonata for violoncello.
(a) Allegro.
(b) Adagio.
(c) Menuetto con variazioni.

Piano accompaniment arranged by Alfredo Piatti

Ludwig van Beethoven, Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," op. 68.

I. The awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country: allegro ma non troppo, F major, 2-4.

II. Scene by the brookside. Andante molto mosso, B-flat major, 12-8.

III. Merry meeting of country folk; allegro, F major, 3-4.

IV. Thunderstorm, tempest; allegro, F minor, 4-4.

V. Shepherds' song. Glad and thankful feelings after storm; allegretto, F major, 6-8.

Bedrich Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride."

The opening overture, and this is said advisedly, because at its conclusion the listener felt it was time for the curtain to go up on the theatricals which had been introduced by the music, was played in the brilliant and precise manner characteristic of this orchestra. In the hands of less accomplished players it would not have sharpened the appetite for the feast that followed, but its interpretation on this occasion was brilliant and peculiarly enjoyable. It has many of the trimmings of so-called modern music, inasmuch as it combines physical and tone energy. It suggests sensation and caters to popular rather than to discriminating taste. Its author was never much in love with it, and he called it the overture to the theatrical fund, because it was written for a performance of the drama "Ruy Blas," given for a benefit at Leipsig in March, 1839. It is primed with crescendo and peppered and salted with dramatics. It takes small effort for the imagination to conjure what the big orchestra did with it. Indeed the author would have probably acquiesced in the opinion that his music had been interpreted in the spirit of its writing.

The ovation bestowed upon Mr. Schroeder after his solo was as much of a compliment to the audience as it was to the matchless player. The demonstration betokened that there was a large number of music lovers in the great auditorium, and that they were not present because it was the thing—something fashionable, you know—but because they were disciples, more or less humble, of the divine art. That 'cello playing was a rare treat. No instrumentalist is prepared to dispute the place accorded Mr. Schroeder. He is reputed to be the most accomplishd player of this instrument on this continent, and without a peer in the world. After his

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., JAN. 15, 1898. No. 411.

FOR five weeks, beginning next Monday evening, the Metropolitan Opera House will be occupied by the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, which has just finished a most brilliant and financially successful seven weeks' season in Philadelphia and neighboring cities. The organization is an excellent one in its vocal and orchestral make-up. The box owners have without hesitancy guaranteed their full support, which insures for the brief season the usual social prestige. On the opening night Melba will make her first appearance in this vicinity since her illness of a year ago. She is again in superb voice. "La Traviata," in which she appeared to such fine advantage, dramatically as well as vocally, last season, will be sung, with Salignac as Alfredo and Campanari as Germont. Melba will also sing at the Saturday matinée, in "Faust," when Ibos and Boudouresque will make their local débuts as Faust and Mephistopheles. Wednesday evening Barna will make her début as Venus in "Tannhæuser," and Gadski, Krauss, Fischer and Bispham will reappear. Friday evening "Die Meistersinger" will be the bill, with Gadski, Krauss, Fischer and Breuner. Later on Melba will sing Rosina in "The Barber of Seville" and the title rôle in "Aïda," both for the first time in New York.

JOHANNA GADSKI.

NEXT week the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Academy of Music in concerts of the two Institute-Philharmonic series. Friday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be Mozart's Symphony, No. 46, in D major (with minuet), the Chopin Nocturne in C minor, the Chopin impromptu in F sharp major, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the overture to "Tannhæuser." Madame Szumowska, the well-known pianist, will be one of the soloists, the other being Evan Williams, who will sing the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger." At the Saturday evening concert the orchestra will play the third overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4, and (for the first time) Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes." The soloist will be Madame Gadski, whose splendid work with the Damrosch Opera Company has placed her high up in the ranks of Wagnerian singers.

DAVID BISPHAM.
Copyright '97 by Aimé Dupont, N. Y.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1898.

The twelfth Symphony programme began with Beethoven's "Pastoral," beautifully played save for a few light touches of modern fashioning, and ended with an animated rendering of Smetana's "Sold Bride" overture. Between these were placed the novelties of the occasion—Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," and a Paganini caprice in an orchestral arrangement by Ladislas Gorski, which Mr. T. Adamowski played with a romance by Beethoven.

The Massenet suite is an elaboration of the incidental music written by that composer for the original production of De Lisle's drama modelled upon the fateful subject of Æschylus, as shown in his portrayal of the tragedy of Orestes, pursued and overcome by the Furies. The first score was limited in its numbers and in the scope of its orchestration. This development, arranged for later performances of the play, includes the whole range of the modern orchestra, from the piccolo to the bass-tuba and from the harp to the big drum, the triangle, the snare-drum and the cymbals. Choruses, omitted in the concert version, were also supplied. The suite divides itself into a strong and earnest andante, which might almost be taken as a protest against constraining power; a Grecian dance of various figures, now set as for rushing whirls of excited dancers, and now for quaint postures and motions; a religious scene or invocation, with a slow, soft, tender 'cello theme (exquisitely played by Mr. Schroeder) for its central spirit, and a swift and turbulent dance movement for a conclusion. The whole work in its variety, its impetuosity, its suggestiveness and its romantico-theatrical essence, belongs to a class with which Mr. Paur is particularly felicitous, and it was splendidly delivered.

Mr. Adamowski gave the calm Beethoven romance a placid flow, and in the Paganini caprice—a bold air with pyrotechnic variations—a clear and elegant execution, masterful in all points of technique and needing but a little more dash to make his reading perfect in the modern fashion which has succeeded Paganini's audacious and almost rash surprises and tours de force.

A violinist will be the soloist at the next concert also—Miss Olive Mead, who is to play a Saint-Saens concerto. The other numbers will be Meyerbeer's "Struensec" overture, an entr' acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and Sgambati's D major symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 16.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twelfth of the Series Was Given Last Night.

Varied Programme Presented with Good Effect—Composers of Several Nationalities Represented—Mr. T. Adamowski the Soloist of the Occasion.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the 12th in the season, were:

Symphony, No. 6, "Pastoral" ....Beethoven
Romanza for violin and orchestra, op. 50. Beethoven
Caprice for violin in A minor, op. 1. . Paganini
Incidental music to "Les Erinnys" . . . .Massenet
Overture to "The Sold Bride" ....Smetana

The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski.

As will be seen, the programme was varied enough in regard to the nationalities of the composers, Germany, Italy, France and Bohemia being represented in it. The novelty was the Massenet suite, consisting of four movements, an entr'acte, a Greek dance, a religious scene, with an invocation, and a ballet-music finale. They were written for a drama by Leconte de Lisle, and some of them show the composer at his best, and before his invention gave out and his mannerisms became so prominent, and imparted a monotonous sameness to his work.

The entr'acte, an andante, has a flowing theme, of which the cantilena is long and graceful, and charming in effect. In the second movement he seems to have had some idea of giving a Greek color to the music by making the flutes prominent. It is the most thoughtful and most effectively individualized portion of the suite, and though the orchestration is at times very brilliant, the composer has held himself in check and avoided his familiar tendency to use a too lavish hand in his instrumental embroideries. The "religious scene" has a chaste and beautiful theme, which is given to a solo 'cello, and the whole movement is delightful in effect.

The finale opens with a fiery dance subject, which presently merges into something very closely resembling a polka, pretty and ear-tickling enough, but with a certain tinge of commonplace. Here again the instrumentation is exceedingly brilliant, with the inevitable Massenet fondness for a noisy climax, with the bass drum for a foundation.

The suite throughout is interesting and wholly pleasing in the hearing, and it largely emphasizes the French instinct and cleverness in ballet music. Nothing could have been more perfect than its performance, and the 'cello solo already named, played with such smoothness, finish of style and tender purity of taste by Mr. Schroeder that he was obliged to rise twice to acknowledge the applause that rewarded the effort.

An exceptionally fine reading of the symphony was given by Mr. Paur. No new effects were sought for, and there was an utter ignoring of the current propensity to modernize the old masters, a fault, however, it should be added, to which Mr. Paur is by no means addicted. The fact would scarcely be worth the mentioning were it not that so much is to be read at present regarding the cleverness of much exploited conductors in rising superior to the composer by impressing their own individualities on him.

The bright and frolicsome Smetana overture was rendered with like spirit and delicacy, the strings acquitting themselves of their lively task at their very best.

Mr. Adamowski has been heard to better advantage than he was in his contributions to this concert. His reading and performance of the Beethoven romanza were somewhat overtame and sugary, and were pretty and effeminate rather than broad and impressive. In the Paganini Caprice, which, by the way, owes its orchestral accompaniment to one Ladislas Gorski, he was much better, though for some reason or other it did not sound as interesting, as brilliant and as well generally in its new form as it does in its original. Mr. Adamowski, who was cordially received, was applauded with great enthusiasm and recalled three times.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Struensee," Meyerbeer; concerto No. 1, for violin, Saint-Saens; entr'acte from "Gwendoline," Chabrier; symphony, D-major, Sgambati. The soloist is to be Miss Olive Mead.

The Boston Symphony orchestra seems to be almost as much of a favorite in Philadelphia as it is at home. At the concert it gave there the other night at the Academy of Music, which is larger than the Boston Theatre, every reserved seat was sold for days before the advertised announcement.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16, 1898.

The program of the 12th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral" ....Beethoven
Romanza for violin and orchestra, in F major, Op. 50.....................Beethoven
Caprice for violin, in A minor, Op. 1.. Paganini
(Transcribed and the orchestral Accompaniment scored by Ladislas Gorski.)
(First time.)
Incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes" ....Massenet
I. Entr'acte.
II. Danse grecque.
III. Scene religieuse.
Invocation.
IV. Finale.
(First time in Boston.)
Overture to "The Sold Bride" ......Smetana

This is the story of Massenet's music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes."

When the play was first performed at the Odéon, Paris, Jan. 6, 1873, Massenet's music consisted of a prelude, an entr'acte, and two melodramatic scenes. It was written for strings, three trombones, and drums. In the "Scène Religieuse," Act II, the chorus of Khoephores, which frames the 'cello solo, played while Electra invokes Hermes, was transcribed for the orchestra. Colonne was the conductor.

A suite was made out of this music and the numbers were, Prelude, Scène Religieuse, Entr'acte, Danse des Saturnales. It was first played at the Cirque d'Hiver, Feb. 16, 1873.

The play was revived at the Théâtre Lyrique, May 15, 1876, and Danbé conducted chorus and orchestra. Musicians found there was too much dialogue, and theatre-goers complained of too much music. Offenbach's view of Grecian mythology was voted more entertaining. But the music is often heard in the suite form, and the 'cello solo is a favorite in concert rooms.

Massenet did not work in antiquarian spirit. He was wise enough to refrain from any attempt to restore the unknown. Little or nothing is known about the music that was used in Greek tragedy, and Massenet contented himself with an attempt at classical severity and serenity except in the Danse des Saturnales, where the Frenchman asserted himself without thought of ancient dance. He once said that a terra cotta vase from Tanagra inspired him to write one of the more sedate numbers.

The music of the entr'acte is not without interest or without plausible classical feeling. The flute duet in the Grecian dance is effective. The 'cello solo, played beautifully by Mr. Schroeder, is one of the most spontaneous and honest of Massenet's melodies. The finale introduces as a second theme the old familiar cantabile for the strings so dear to this composer. As a whole, the music is well made and free from the suspicion of the Spanish fly that often leads Massenet to musical excesses.

⁂

Smetana said, "I composed the 'Sold Bride,' not on account of ambition, but as a sort of consolation, because I was reproached, after my opera, 'The Brandenburgians in Bohemia,' was produced, with being a Wagnerite. People said that I could do nothing in lighter, popular vein."

The chief theme of the opera, for the leit-motiv is used discreetly, is the sale of the bride, and this furnishes thematic material to the overture. The piece is familiar and does not demand long attention. It was played with great spirit.

⁂

I regret to say that Mr. Adamowski was not at his best. He has made such praiseworthy progress during the last few years that his performance last night was a disappointment. His intonation was frequently at fault in each piece. The romanza was given without breadth or repose, and in the caprice the bravura was uncertain and without authority. Nevertheless, he was applauded loudly. Had the violinist been Ysaye or Marteau the audience would not apparently have been more tickled.

⁂

I did not hear the first two movements of the Pastoral Symphony, and I hope I shall never be obliged to hear them. To me the whole symphony is one of the stupidest works ever penned by a great man.

There are hundreds, yes thousands of estimable persons who delight in mimetic music. Beethoven thoughtfully provided these persons with a nightingale, a quail, a cuckoo, and a thunder storm in which the thunder-clap always precedes the lightning-flash. No wonder that they prefer this music to the Eroica, the fifth, or the first three movements of the ninth symphony. The only wonder is that they do not insist on the conductor wearing a be-ribboned straw hat—this style for a quarter—and exchanging his baton for a shepherd's crook.

Philip Hale.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, JAN. 16, 1898.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

The orchestral numbers for the 12th symphony program comprised Beethoven's sixth symphony, Massenet's incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes," and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride." Mr T. Adamowski, the soloist, played Beethoven's F major romanza for violin and orchestra, and Gorski's transcription of the Paganini A minor caprice for violin. Mr Adamowski's interpretation of the romanza was admirable throughout, the artist playing with a breadth of tone and a sympathetic exposition of the theme motif that was highly satisfying. The aria was beautifully presented, Mr Adamowski's fingering being true to pitch, delicate and firm. In the Paganini caprice, the transcription of which by Gorski was dedicated to the soloist, the performer was heard to good advantage, the difficult variations being skilfully played, and showing his ability in a technical way. The harmonic variations call for special commendation, and there were many passages in the finale given with brilliant effect. Mr Adamowski's reception was most cordial, and at the close of his performance he was recalled several times to the platform.

The orchestra played Massenet's "Les Erinnyes" music for the first time here, and each so-called "tone picture" was vividly illustrated, the intricacies and peculiarities of the instrumentation receiving conscientious and artistic treatment. The introduction to the "Grecian Dance" offered no obstacles to the men; but the dance movement was a different matter, and here the grand team work of the symphony band was notably prominent. In the rhythmic oddities of the score, the strange contrasts and harmonies are so frequent that a single hearing does not suffice on which to form a very clear opinion of the merit of the interpretation, but there can be no question as to the effectiveness of the movement, and each contingent, seemingly worked with the usual unanimity of execution.

In the third movement the florid phases between the clarinet and oboe were skilfully played. The muted cello sang with exquisite effect the cantilena, and for this charming bit Mr Schroeder received rounds of applause. The simple and graceful themes in this part are specially pleasing, and proved to be the most satisfying of the four movements. The finale, a wild dance motif, elaborate and free in development, was played with the necessary abandon and vigor by the orchestra.

Beethoven's noble "Pastoral" symphony served to give dignity to the long program. The work was grandly played. The Smetana overture went smoothly, as a rule, and the fortissimo passages were given with a vigor that at times was almost deafening.

There will be no concerts this week. The program for Jan 28 and 29 will be as follows: Overture, "Struensee," Meyenbeer; concerto for violin, No. 3, Saint-Saens; entr'acte from "Gwendoline," Chabrier; symphony in D major, Sgambati. Miss Olive Mead will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1898.

(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The orchestral selections were Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony in F No. 6; Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Mr. Adamowski's solos were Beethoven's romance for violin and orchestra, op. 50, and caprice for violin from op. 1 by Paginini, with orchestral accompaniment by L. Gorski. The principal number of the programme as to novelty was the Massenot suite, which was given for the first time in this city. It is the incidental music written for Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes," an antique drama in two parts, first given in Paris in 1873. The suite was originally for strings only with a few trombone passages in the prelude. It was since remodelled, and as given at this concert consists of four short movements, which includes a Grecian dance and a religious movement and invocation and a very lively finale.

The invocation consists of a rather pathetic cantelena played by a muted 'cello with accompaniment by muted strings, and is the gem of the whole suite. On a first hearing it impresses one very favorably. Mr. Schroeder's playing of the 'cello solo was superb. The work of the orchestra in the suite was as usual of a very high order. The Pastoral symphony and the overture were also finely played. Mr. Adamowski fairly outdid himself in his two solos and received an immense ovation, which was fully deserved. There will be no rehearsal and concert next week. For Jan. 28 and 29 the orchestral numbers will include a Sgambate symphony, Meyerbeer's overture, "Struensee," and Chabrier's entr'acte from "Gwendoline." Miss Olive Mead will be the soloist.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., JAN. 15, 1898. No. 411.

FOR five weeks, beginning next Monday evening, the Metropolitan Opera House will be occupied by the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, which has just finished a most brilliant and financially successful seven weeks' season in Philadelphia and neighboring cities. The organization is an excellent one in its vocal and orchestral make-up. The box owners have without hesitancy guaranteed their full support, which insures for the brief season the usual social prestige. On the opening night Melba will make her first appearance in this vicinity since her illness of a year ago. She is again in superb voice. "La Traviata," in which she appeared to such fine advantage, dramatically as well as vocally, last season, will be sung, with Salignac as Alfredo and Campanari as Germont. Melba will also sing at the Saturday matinée, in "Faust," when Ibos and Boudouresque will make their local débuts as Faust and Mephistopheles. Wednesday evening Barna will make her début as Venus in "Tannhæuser," and Gadski, Krauss, Fischer and Bispham will reappear. Friday evening "Die Meistersinger" will be the bill, with Gadski, Krauss, Fischer and Breuner. Later on Melba will sing Rosina in "The Barber of Seville" and the title rôle in "Aïda," both for the first time in New York.

JOHANNA GADSKI.

NEXT week the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear at the Academy of Music in concerts of the two Institute-Philharmonic series. Friday afternoon the orchestral numbers will be Mozart's Symphony, No. 46, in D major (with minuet), the Chopin Nocturne in C minor, the Chopin impromptu in F sharp major, Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music and the overture to "Tannhæuser." Madame Szumowska, the well-known pianist, will be one of the soloists, the other being Evan Williams, who will sing the "Prize Song" from "Die Meistersinger." At the Saturday evening concert the orchestra will play the third overture to Beethoven's "Fidelio," Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4, and (for the first time) Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes." The soloist will be Madame Gadski, whose splendid work with the Damrosch Opera Company has placed her high up in the ranks of Wagnerian singers.

DAVID BISPHAM.
Copyright '97 by Aimé Dupont, N. Y

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1898.

The twelfth Symphony programme began with Beethoven's "Pastoral," beautifully played save for a few light touches of modern fashioning, and ended with an animated rendering of Smetana's "Sold Bride" overture. Between these were placed the novelties of the occasion—Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," and a Paganini caprice in an orchestral arrangement by Ladislas Gorski, which Mr. T. Adamowski played with a romance by Beethoven.

The Massenet suite is an elaboration of the incidental music written by that composer for the original production of De Lisle's drama modelled upon the fateful subject of Æschylus, as shown in his portrayal of the tragedy of Orestes, pursued and overcome by the Furies. The first score was limited in its numbers and in the scope of its orchestration. This development, arranged for later performances of the play, includes the whole range of the modern orchestra, from the piccolo to the bass-tuba and from the harp to the big drum, the triangle, the snare-drum and the cymbals. Choruses, omitted in the concert version, were also supplied. The suite divides itself into a strong and earnest andante, which might almost be taken as a protest against constraining power; a Grecian dance of various figures, now set as for rushing whirls of excited dancers, and now for quaint postures and motions; a religious scene or invocation, with a slow, soft, tender 'cello theme (exquisitely played by Mr. Schroeder) for its central spirit, and a swift and turbulent dance movement for a conclusion. The whole work in its variety, its impetuosity, its suggestiveness and its romantico-theatrical essence, belongs to a class with which Mr. Paur is particularly felictious, and it was splendidly delivered.

Mr. Adamowski gave the calm Beethoven romance a placid flow, and in the Paganini caprice—a bold air with pyrotechnic variations—a clear and elegant execution, masterful in all points of technique and needing but a little more dash to make his reading perfect in the modern fashion which has succeeded Paganini's audacious and almost rash surprises and tours de force.

A violinist will be the soloist at the next concert also—Miss Olive Mead, who is to play a Saint-Saens concerto. The other numbers will be Meyerbeer's "Struensec" overture, an entr' aete from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," and Sgambati's D major symphony.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 16.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Twelfth of the Series Was Given Last Night.

Varied Programme Presented with Good Effect—Composers of Several Nationalities Represented—Mr. T. Adamowski the Soloist of the Occasion.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, and the 12th in the season, were:

Symphony, No. 6, "Pastoral"........Beethoven
Romanza for violin and orchestra, op. 50.
Beethoven
Caprice for violin in A minor, op. 1..Paganini
Incidental music to "Les Erinnys"....Massenet
Overture to "The Sold Bride"........Smetana

The soloist was Mr. T. Adamowski.

As will be seen, the programme was varied enough in regard to the nationalities of the composers, Germany, Itàly, France and Bohemia being represented in it. The novelty was the Massenet suite, consisting of four movements, an entr'acte, a Greek dance, a religious scene, with an invocation, and a ballet-music finale. They were written for a drama by Leconte de Lisle, and some of them show the composer at his best, and before his invention gave out and his mannerisms became so prominent, and imparted a monotonous sameness to his work.

The entr'acte, an andante, has a flowing theme, of which the cantilena is long and graceful, and charming in effect. In the second movement he seems to have had some idea of giving a Greek color to the music by making the flutes prominent. It is the most thoughtful and most effectively individualized portion of the suite, and though the orchestration is at times very brilliant, the composer has held himself in check and avoided his familiar tendency to use a too lavish hand in his instrumental embroideries. The "religious scene" has a chaste and beautiful theme, which is given to a solo 'cello, and the whole movement is delightful in effect.

The finale opens with a fiery dance subject, which presently merges into something very closely resembling a polka, pretty and ear-tickling enough, but with a certain tinge of commonplace. Here again the instrumentation is exceedingly brilliant, with the inevitable Massenet fondness for a noisy climax, with the bass drum for a foundation.

The suite throughout is interesting and wholly pleasing in the hearing, and it largely emphasizes the French instinct and cleverness in ballet music. Nothing could have been more perfect than its performance, and the 'cello solo already named, played with such smoothness, finish of style and tender purity of taste by Mr. Schroeder that he was obliged to rise twice to acknowledge the applause that rewarded the effort.

An exceptionally fine reading of the symphony was given by Mr. Paur. No new effects were sought for, and there was an utter ignoring of the current propensity to modernize the old masters, a fault, however, it should be added, to which Mr. Paur is by no means addicted. The fact would scarcely be worth the mentioning were it not that so much is to be read at present regarding the cleverness of much exploited conductors in rising superior to the composer by impressing their own individualities on him.

The bright and frolicsome Smetana overture was rendered with like spirit and delicacy, the strings acquitting themselves of their lively task at their very best.

Mr. Adamowski has been heard to better advantage than he was in his contributions to this concert. His reading and performance of the Beethoven romanza were somewhat overtame and sugary, and were pretty and effeminate rather than broad and impressive. In the Paganini Caprice, which, by the way, owes its orchestral accompaniment to one Ladislas Gorski, he was much better, though for some reason or other it did not sound as interesting, as brilliant and as well generally in its new form as it does in its original. Mr. Adamowski, who was cordially received, was applauded with great enthusiasm and recalled three times.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Struensee," Meyerbeer; concerto No. 1, for violin, Saint-Saens; entr'acte from "Gwendoline," Chabrier; symphony, D-major, Sgambati. The soloist is to be Miss Olive Mead.

The Boston Symphony orchestra seems to be almost as much of a favorite in Philadelphia as it is at home. At the concert it gave there the other night at the Academy of Music, which is larger than the Boston Theatre, every reserved seat was sold for days before the advertised announcement.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16, 1898.

The program of the 12th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".......Beethoven
Romanza for violin and orchestra, in F major, Op. 50....................Beethoven
Caprice for violin, in A minor, Op. 1..
Paganini
(Transcribed and the orchestral Accompaniment scored by Ladislas Gorski.)
(First time.)
Incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes"......................Massenet
I. Entr'acte.
II. Danse grecque.
III. Scene religieuse.
Invocation.
IV. Finale.
(First time in Boston.)
Overture to "The Sold Bride"......Smetana

This is the story of Massenet's music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes."

When the play was first performed at the Odéon, Paris, Jan. 6, 1873, Massenet's music consisted of a prelude, an entr'acte, and two melodramatic scenes. It was written for strings, three trombones, and drums. In the "Scène Religieuse," Act II, the chorus of Khoephores, which frames the 'cello solo, played while Electra invokes Hermes, was transcribed for the orchestra. Colonne was the conductor.

A suite was made out of this music and the numbers were, Prelude, Scène Religieuse, Entr'acte, Danse des Saturnales. It was first played at the Cirque d'Hiver, Feb. 16, 1873.

The play was revived at the Théâtre Lyrique, May 15, 1876, and Danbé conducted chorus and orchestra. Musicians found there was too much dialogue, and theatre-goers complained of too much music. Offenbach's view of Grecian mythology was voted more entertaining. But the music is often heard in the suite form, and the 'cello solo is a favorite in concert rooms.

Massenet did not work in antiquarian spirit. He was wise enough to refrain from any attempt to restore the unknown. Little or nothing is known about the music that was used in Greek tragedy, and Massenet contented himself with an attempt at classical severity and serenity except in the Danse des Saturnales, where the Frenchman asserted himself without thought of ancient dance. He once said that a terra cotta vase from Tanagra inspired him to write one of the more sedate numbers.

The music of the entr'acte is not without interest or without plausible classical feeling. The flute duet in the Grecian dance is effective. The 'cello solo, played beautifully by Mr. Schroeder, is one of the most spontaneous and honest of Massenet's melodies. The finale introduces as a second theme the old familiar cantabile for the strings so dear to this composer. As a whole, the music is well made and free from the suspicion of the Spanish fly that often leads Massenet to musical excesses.

⁂

Smetana said, "I composed the 'Sold Bride,' not on account of ambition, but as a sort of consolation, because I was reproached, after my opera, 'The Brandenburgians in Bohemia,' was produced, with being a Wagnerite. People said that I could do nothing in lighter, popular vein."

The chief theme of the opera, for the leit-motiv is used discreetly, is the sale of the bride, and this furnishes thematic material to the overture. The piece is familiar and does not demand long attention. It was played with great spirit.

⁂

I regret to say that Mr. Adamowski was not at his best. He has made such praiseworthy progress during the last few years that his performance last night was a disappointment. His intonation was frequently at fault in each piece. The romanza was given without breadth or repose, and in the caprice the bravura was uncertain and without authority. Nevertheless, he was applauded loudly. Had the violinist been Ysaye or Marteau the audience would not apparently have been more tickled.

⁂

I did not hear the first two movements of the Pastoral Symphony, and I hope I shall never be obliged to hear them. To me the whole symphony is one of the stupidest works ever penned by a great man.

There are hundreds, yes thousands of estimable persons who delight in mimetic music. Beethoven thoughtfully provided these persons with a nightingale, a quail, a cuckoo, and a thunder storm in which the thunder-clap always precedes the lightning-flash. No wonder that they prefer this music to the Eroica, the fifth, or the first three movements of the ninth symphony. The only wonder is that they do not insist on the conductor wearing a be-ribboned straw that—this style for a quarter—and exchanging his baton for a shepherd's crook.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 16, 1898.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

The orchestral numbers for the 12th symphony program comprised Beethoven's sixth symphony, Massenet's incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes," and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride." Mr T. Adamowski, the soloist, played Beethoven's F major romanza for violin and orchestra, and Gorski's transcription of the Paganini A minor caprice for violin. Mr Adamowski's interpretation of the romanza was admirable throughout, the artist playing with a breadth of tone and a sympathetic exposition of the theme motif that was highly satisfying. The aria was beautifully presented, Mr Adamowski's fingering being true to pitch, delicate and firm. In the Paganini caprice, the transcription of which by Gorski was dedicated to the soloist, the performer was heard to good advantage, the difficult variations being skilfully played, and showing his ability in a technical way. The harmonic variations call for special commendation, and there were many passages in the finale given with brilliant effect. Mr Adamowski's reception was most cordial, and at the close of his performance he was recalled several times to the platform.

The orchestra played Massenet's "Les Erinnyes" music for the first time here, and each so-called "tone picture" was vividly illustrated, the intricacies and peculiarities of the instrumentation receiving conscientious and artistic treatment. The introduction to the "Grecian Dance" offered no obstacles to the men; but the dance movement was a different matter, and here the grand team work of the symphony band was notably prominent. In the rhythmic oddities of the score, the strange contrasts and harmonies are so frequent that a single hearing does not suffice on which to form a very clear opinion of the merit of the interpretation, but there can be no question as to the effectiveness of the movement, and each contingent, seemingly worked with the usual unanimity of execution.

In the third movement the florid phases between the clarinet and oboe were skilfully played. The muted cello sang with exquisite effect the cantilena, and for this charming bit Mr Schroeder received rounds of applause. The simple and graceful themes in this part are specially pleasing, and proved to be the most satisfying of the four movements. The finale, a wild dance motif, elaborate and free in development, was played with the necessary abandon and vigor by the orchestra.

Beethoven's noble "Pastoral" symphony served to give dignity to the long program. The work was grandly played. The Smetana overture went smoothly, as a rule, and the fortissimo passages were given with a vigor that at times was almost deafening.

There will be no concerts this week. The program for Jan 28 and 29 will be as follows: Overture, "Struensee," Meyenbeer; concerto for violin, No. 3, Saint-Saens; entr'acte from "Gwendoline," Chabrier; symphony in D major, Sgambati. Miss Olive Mead will be the soloist.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 16, 1898.

(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The orchestral selections were Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony in F No. 6; Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes," and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." Mr. Adamowski's solos were Beethoven's romance for violin and orchestra, op. 50, and caprice for violin from op. 1 by Paginini, with orchestral accompaniment by L. Gorski. The principal number of the programme as to novelty was the Massenet suite, which was given for the first time in this city. It is the incidental music written for Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes," an antique drama in two parts, first given in Paris in 1873. The suite was originally for strings only with a few trombone passages in the prelude. It was since remodelled, and as given at this concert consists of four short movements, which includes a Grecian dance and a religious movement and invocation and a very lively finale.

The invocation consists of a rather pathetic cantelena played by a muted 'cello with accompaniment by muted strings, and is the gem of the whole suite. On a first hearing it impresses one very favorably. Mr. Schroeder's playing of the 'cello solo was superb. The work of the orchestra in the suite was as usual of a very high order. The Pastoral symphony and the overture were also finely played. Mr. Adamowski fairly outdid himself in his two solos and received an immense ovation, which was fully deserved. There will be no rehearsal and concert next week. For Jan. 28 and 29 the orchestral numbers will include a Sgambate symphony, Meyerbeer's overture, "Struensee," and Chabrier's entr'acte from "Gwendoline." Miss Olive Mead will be the soloist.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 17, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twelfth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68.
Beethoven: Romanza for violin and orchestra, in F major, opus 50.
Paganini: Caprice for violin, in A minor, opus 1. (Transcribed and the Accompaniment scored by Ladislas Gorski.) (First time.)
Massenet: Incidental Music to "Les Erinnyes." (First time in Boston.)
Smetana: Overture to "Prodana nevesta."

Mr. T. Adamowski was the violinist.

Opinion has come to be pretty well divided about Beethoven's "Pastorale." Although it has probably been admiringly mentioned oftener than any other of the composer's works—by not especially musical people, who thought to find an æsthetic foothold for their non-musicianship in the quasi-poetic headings of the several movements—it has seldom, if ever, been ranked as one of his great symphonies by musicians. And it is not to be denied that many a sympathizer with modern musical directions finds it heartily tiresome today. The themes, many of which are taken from Croatian folk-songs, seem trivial to more than one connoisseur, and their working-out prolix and tedious; even the once-famous "Thunderstorm" has been charged with a lack both of realism and impressiveness. Indeed, the "Pastorale" is probably the symphony of Beethoven's which has aged most in popular opinion and in that of the average musician today. Unquestionably there is some reason for this: the naive slightness of the thematic material may seem almost uniquely out of proportion with the extent to which it is worked out, all the more so, perhaps, because this working-out is in general of the simplest description and protracted to an extent that would lead one to expect far greater elaborateness. Figures are repeated over and over again with persistent reiteration against a background of slowly shifting harmony, and there are not a few places in the work where, after hearing the first measure of a new period, you know perfectly well beforehand what the next fifteen measures are going to be. The plan often seems desperately regular and predetermined. It may be said, too, that Beethoven, by a process of which he alone seems to have possessed the secret, has eliminated all the "characteristic" folk-song zest from the themes themselves; they do not sound in the least Slavic, their native wildness has been all tamed out of them.

No doubt these are excellent reasons why the symphony should be found poor and tiresome, or would be, if one's feelings toward music were governed by reasons, and not the immediate result of direct perception. If a man really does not like the "Pastorale," such reasons as these may serve to make him more comfortable in his dislike; but to him who does like the work they have no convincing force whatever. And we must own that we have always liked this symphony passing well; it seems to us a wondrously poetic work, brimming over with the purest musical beauty, full of "Gemüth" and genius. We have never been able to find a tiresome measure in it. Moreover, it seems to us, from the mere point of view of instrumentation, one of the most admirable scores in existence; we know of nothing that surpasses it in beauty of coloring. It is not often that one hears a thoroughly good and sympathetic performance of such a work nowadays; few modern conductors can easily bring themselves to let its absolute simplicity of expression go unadorned. They too often paint this lily in up-to-date colors to suit themselves and the times. The performance last Saturday evening was to us a wonder of perfection; everything went just right, and the beautiful work was shown forth in all its native grace. Surely this performance may count as one of Mr. Paur's finest triumphs.

Massenet's music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes" was written at a time when the composer still had his reputation largely before him, and he accordingly took pains with his work. His melodic invention was still tolerably fresh. But the work comes to us several years too late; one cannot help recognizing it as belonging to a transitional period in French composition, to a period which is now past. In the early seventies, Berlioz was still "in the future" in France; composers had not yet begun to climb up upon his eagle head, to take their lark's flight from that point of vantage, but were rather bent upon filling up the gap between Meyerbeer and him. Their point of view was almost necessarily a temporary one, and has now become old-fashioned. There is much graceful invention in this "Erinnyes" music, much brilliancy of orchestration; but also not a little triviality and tinsel glitter. The selections were admirably played, Mr. Schroeder working wonders with the 'cello solo in the "Invocation."

But there is more genius in Smetana's "Prodana nevesta" overture than in all this more portentous music of Massenet's; the oftener one hears the work the better one likes it. The performance went to a charm.

Mr. Adamowski is to be thanked for letting us hear Beethoven's romanza in F once more; it is not the sort of thing one cares to hear every day in the week, nor every month in the year; but it has lain fallow so long that it comes back very fresh and inspiring. The more so that Mr. Adamowski shows forth in his playing just the true, ecstatic character of the melody. He plays it simply and with a certain reverence that has nothing of coldness in it; with infinite beauty of tone and grace of phrasing. The Paganini caprice, on the other hand, seems to us to belong distinctly to the things that have been. A set of variations, written with cleverness, but without genius, is not an inspiring thing nowadays; especially a set of variations in which the main object is to display a virtuoso technique. And we do not think that Mr. Gorski's accompaniment adds very much to them. Mr. Adamowski played the thing excellently well, and was rapturously recalled three times. But our enjoyment was in the Beethoven romanza.

The next programme—for Jan. 28 and 29 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Meyerbeer, overture to "Struensee;" Saint-Saëns, concerto for violin, No. 1, in A major, opus 20; Chabrier, entr'ace from "Gwendoline;" Sgambati, symphony No. 1, in D major, opus 16. Miss Olive Mead will be the violinist.

The Philadelphia concerts by our Symphony Orchestra are given in the Academy of Music, seating three thousand, and as a striking indication of the orchestra's remarkable success the management has inserted as a permanent part of the advertisement in the Philadelphia papers several days before each concert, the line "Every reserve seat sold." The orchestra plays tonight in Philadelphia; tomorrow afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore; in Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Thursday evening; in Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 17, 1898.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

T. Adamowski as Soloist Applauded to the Echo.

Beethoven's sixth symphony, "the Pastoral," is the weakest of the nine, yet it is the one which the general public seems to enjoy the most and grow most applausive over.

The reason is not far to seek; it is "programme-music," instrumental music telling a definite story, and therefore each auditor is sure of his ground, is certain that he is dilating with the proper emotion. Yet this is the weakest side of instrumental music; if our art is to present merely a series of pictures, it is bound to be weaker than poetry or painting, both of which speak more definitely, describe more unmistakably, than music can ever hope to do.

It is a great error to suppose that, because the auditor comprehends the Village Dance, the thunderstorm, or the scene by the Brook, in this symphony, he is any nearer to "understanding music;" in fact he may be further than ever from the comprehension of the art, as the English audiences were (a few years ago) when they listened to this symphony and gazed at a background of scenery which had been painted to fit the musical sentiments and was changed at each movement.

Beethoven himself showed plainly that he did not consider this style of tone-picture the highest flight of art, by the apologetic manner in which he prefaced the first movement—"More a presentation of impressions than painting" (subjective, then, not objective) and he held to this scheme through the whole first movement, the best in the symphony; in this he does not attempt a single sketch of nature, but creates logical music, beautifully developed from a single phrase, the one which opens the work. This movement was excellently performed, repeat and all.

The second movement is the most definite kind of "painting," and Beethoven never came so dangerously near to boredom in any symphony. At the culmination the oboe becomes a quail, the flute a nightingale, and the clarinette a cuckoo, and the three sing their ticketed phrases in a manner that makes the end of the movement a musical poultry yard. Of course this part received much applause.

The third movement is better; still labelling its pictures, it has a heartiness and joviality that is refreshing, and the time-honored jest of the three-noted bassoonist loses none of its pungency by repeated hearing. The oboe and bassoon gave their parts here with becoming emphasis.

The thunder-storm was very finely played. It is a splendid example of Beethoven's skill in scoring. There is plenty of bad weather in the musical repertoire; Wagner has given a couple of respectable storms, Berlioz has scored a heavy shower ("Symphonie Fantastique"), Rubinstein has produced a gale ("Ocean Symphony"), St. Saens has presented a cyclone ("Le Deluge") and many more instances might be cited, but none of these composers, using a vast modern orchestra, has rivalled Beethoven with his conservative, classical orchestra.

The anxious phrases of the second violins, the hush of nature before the storm, the blurring of contrabasses and violoncellos (four notes against five) the roar of the trombone, the whistling of the wind, on the piccolo, all these are the touches of the master of tone-coloring, and these lost nothing of their power in the performance.

The finale is less satisfactory. Of course the inevitable shepherd comes out to look after his flocks or herds, and the sound of his horn is the visible sign of the clearing-up shower. The instrument which almost all composers use to picture the shepherd's pipe is the English horn, and Rossini, Schumann, Berlioz, Wagner, have all used this instrument in connection with the cattle-raising industry; but Beethoven never used the English horn in an orchestral work (nor did Weber or Mozart ever employ it), and it may be doubted whether even in the prolix Trio, Op. 87, for two oboes and an English horn, Beethoven had the modern English horn in mind, and not the old Oboe da Caccia. In this symphony the cattle are called by clarinette and French horn.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist of the concert. He gave two interesting violin numbers. The first, Beethoven's Romanza, Op. 50, was delicately and expressively played. It was an example of the Beethoven of the first period, and presented nothing but what could be readily understood. The second selection was much more ambitious, being Paganini's Caprice for Violin, Op. 1, arranged for orchestra by Ladislas Gorski, and dedicated to Mr. Adamowski.

There were some terrifically difficult passages in this. One may wonder if many of the general publich grasped the technical difficulties involved in the high, piping melody played in harmonics. This might have had more power, but it was performed without a break of any kind. But the passages after it went less perfectly, there being an occasional slip of intonation, and the effort required by the complex task being too apparent.

We wish that Mr. Adamowski had chosen a more thankful work for his appearance. As it was, he was applauded to the echo, being recalled three times.

Now followed Massenet's music to de Lisle's "Les Erinyees," an example of a more direct and less erotic Massenet than we possess at present. These Erinyes were not inhabitants of Ireland, but the dreadful Eumenides, the avenging furies, the criminal hunters, the Sherlock Holmeses of the ancient mythology. The whole matter is derived from Aeschylus.

When the tragedy of the Eumenides was produced in Athens "there was a special chorus of 50 members; these were apparelled as the hideous furies, all in black, with angry countenances, snakes twining in their hair. When these frightful apparitions came upon the scene the effect was terrible; women shrieked and fell in convulsions, and several children died of fright."

There was nothing of this horror in the music, which was an agreeable melange midway between Offenbach and Bizet. There were no efforts made to do the impossible and bring back Grecian music, although in the pretty second movement the two flutes gave a very dainty reminder of the love of the old Greeks for this instrument, and the Doric, scale-construction was occasionally applied.

In the "Invocation" the solo violoncello playing of Mr. Schroeder caused great enthusiasm, which seemingly prevented the return of the first (orchestral) part of the movement. There were many dance rhythms, but there was little of the stateliness which the Greek writers assure us was present in the Pyrrhic dance and in the dignified Emmeleia. The work was, however, a pleasing and beautifully melodic one, and it deserved the hearty applause it received.

As a brilliant close to a sparkling programme there came Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride." This is not as distinctly national a work as are most of the compositions of this ill-fated genius, but it is dashing in the extreme, and it betrays considerable contrapuntal skill. The "fugue of imitation" with which the work begins is as chattering and bright as the fugue exposition with which Mozart begins his "Magic Flute" overture. There was heavy work for the strings in this overture, but it was a matter of course that the passages should have been played clearly, for there are no difficulties existing in music which our splendid body of violinists cannot readily overcome.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 22, 1898.

NORDICA CALLED PLAYERS

Reprimanded Members of Symphony Orchestra.

THEY DID NOT APPLAUD

NEW YORK, Jan. 22.—Whenever distinguished soloists, vocal or instrumental, appear at first-class orchestral concerts like those of the Philharmonic, Symphony Society and Boston Symphony orchestra, the applause which greets them as they retire from the stage is usually twofold. It comes not only from the audience, but also from the orchestra. The violinists turn their instruments over and rap them smartly with their bows, and the other instrumentalists clap their hands. This is not only considered the soloist's due, but is regarded as an almost peremptory act of courtesy.

It was very noticeable on Thursday night at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House that, as Mme. Nordica retired after singing "Ah Perfido" and Elizabeth's entrance aria from "Tannhauser," not a violin was turned in the orchestra, nor did any member of it applaud her. Yesterday it was rumored that Mme. Nordica sharply reprimanded the orchestra for the manner in which they accompanied her.

Now, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not composed of conservatory pupils. It is acknowledged to be the finest body of instrumentalists in the United States, and one of the best in the world. It resented the cutting remarks made by Mme. Nordica by not applauding her at the concert.

One of them said: "We had to rehearse under difficulties. We were crowded in a corner of the Metropolitan Opera House stage. A ballet rehearsal was going on at the same time. The light was poor, and we had to stand up.

"In the Wagner selection, in which an unusual cut had been made, the violoncellos came in wrong. Mme. Nordica turned around and said sharply: 'That's like a Kalamazoo orchestra,' and this to the Boston Symphony Orchestra!"

An effort was made last night to see Mme. Nordica at her hotel, but she had retired.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JANUARY 24, 1898.

NORDICA'S WRATH.

She Snapped Out an Insult to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Members Resented It.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was reported to be in a disturbed state of mind Saturday night. The orchestra was at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, where Mme. Nordica sang. She was refused the customary applause by the orchestra because she had snappily criticised their playing at a rehearsal before the performance. The custom has been for the players to turn their violins and rap the backs sharply with their bows. This they did not do. One of the players said about it:

"We had to rehearse under difficulties. We were crowded in a corner of the Metropolitan Opera House stage. A ballet rehearsal was going on at the same time. The light was poor, and we had to stand up.

"In the Wagner selection, in which an unusual cut had been made, the violoncellos came in wrong. Mme. Nordica turned around and said sharply, 'That's like a Kalamazoo orchestra,' and this to the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

"There was quite a breeze over it, I assure you. We were exceedingly indignant. For that reason we did not applaud her at the concert. But she has probably never sung to a finer accompaniment than we gave her."

Mr. Zach of the Symphony Orchestra says that it was not much of an affair, anyhow. The orchestra came back to Boston yesterday morning, and the accounts in the newspapers explained the whole story, he said. The explanation for the refusal of the orchestra to applaud Nordica was fully set forth in the Sunday papers.

So far as he was concerned Mr. Zach said he was not in the matter, at the first. He did not notice what Nordica said, and did not think it amounted to much. He thought only a few heard her remarks, and it seemed to touch their pride, but he was not in the council of war which followed. He did not applaud, he said, because the order was not to do so.

The rehearsal was under difficulties, as stated in the story published Sunday, and not much should have been expected. A mistake was made in the music, and the orchestra went back to play it over, and it was then when he understood the remarks were made by Nordica, to the effect that the playing was like that of a Kalamazoo orchestra.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1898.

The Eleventh Symphony Concert was given January 8, in Music Hall. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's smug overture to "Ruy Blas," which has not been played at these concerts since the season of 1891-'92, and no wonder. You remember that Mendelssohn described the play as "really of no value—absolutely below contempt—wretched." What a finical Miss he was! The overture, the result of a cross between the beer garden and the salon, reminded me of Aubrey Beardsley's biting caricature of the composer.

* * *

After this overture came the latest composition of Charles Martin Loeffler, symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlinck), for orchestra, and two violes d'amour obbligate (MS). It was the first performance. The violes d'amour were played by Mr. Kneisel and the composer.

This piece is scored for one piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, one bass clarinet (the part, however, was given at the concert to a double bass clarinet, played by Mr. Kohl, of New York, the inventor), four horns, two trumpets, two cornets, three trombones, one bass tuba, two pairs of kettle drums, cymbals, bass drum, gong, two harps, two violes d'amour and the usual strings.

Let me now quote a few lines from Mr. Apthorp's program book: "From a poetico-dramatic point of view the two violes d'amour, which never appear separated, may be taken as the musical incarnation of the characters of the child Tintagiles and his sister, Ygraine, in Maeterlinck's drama, but the music in nowise seeks to follow out the action of the drama, scene by scene, but rather to depict the struggle between two opposing forces—the Queen and her Handmaids on the one hand and Tintagiles and Ygraine on the other."

My friend, Mr. Apthorp, was delighted to find that Mr. Loeffler did not neglect wholly the sonata form. Whether he neglected it or respected it is to me of little moment.

Do you remember what Smetana wrote to Joseph Srb explaining his quartet, "Aus meinem Leben?"

"I send you herewith the score of a string quartet, which is in manuscript, and until now has never been out of my hands. I gladly leave the style to the judgment of another, and I shall not be offended if it does not please, because it is opposed to the style in which all preceding quartets have been composed. It was not my intention to make a quartet after a set receipt and in conventional form. As a youngster at school I studied theory sufficiently, so that I know what style means, and I am master of it. I prefer to have circumstances determine form. And so I wrote this quartet in the form which it itself demanded."

Now, suppose the hearer to be without knowledge of Maeterlinck's little drama, which is to me one of the most moving and pathetic works of literary man. Suppose the piece were entitled simply Symphonic Poem.

He would—and he is the stumbling-block at the beginning—at least I think he would at once become conscious of warring elements, in nature or in the mind of human persons. He would admire the swing and the passion of the opening; he would find the more cantabile motive of greater breadth and more sustained swoop than is often the case in Mr. Loeffler's music. The cantilena in the bass clarinet, accompanied by the violes d'amour, in thirds would change his mood. He would be reminded of battle or triumph by the fanfares. He would hear complaint in the wailing of the violes d'amour. He would count twelve strokes of the harps and think of midnight, for on the stage the stroke of twelve never announces noon. Renewed strife and passion and complaint until the final dying away of the cantabile theme which returned to the violes d'amour.

He would say, rembering that this is the first serious work of Mr. Loeffler which is purely orchestral, "The man knows a marvelous use of the orchestra; he has found out combinations and tonal effects that did not exist before this in orchestral literature. Occasionally he errs, perhaps; for instance I find one speech of the muted trumpet incongruous and destructive; but in ensemble and in detail there are frequent revelations of orchestral genius. To me he is a greater colorist than Richard Strauss."

And to all this I would agree. But what would he say to the violes d'amour? Might he not say, "Truly an interesting instrument, historically, and I am glad to hear it. Yet I find the sweet-sick complaint soon becomes indescribably monotonous and irritating to the nerves. I suppose he chose the two violes for an express purpose. I think he made a mistake; or at least he used them too much. For the very measures that he thought would thus be most effective are to me less impressive than the other portions of the work. And yet I shall never forget how they sounded. And even now I hear the voice of their complaint."

* * *

From time to time articles aginst "decadents" in music are written and published. Writers will name Ibsen, Zola, Verlaine and Maeterlinck in a sentence, declaim bitterly against the lot, and censure musicians who derive any kind of inspiration from the works of such wretched beings. The very grouping shows that these declaimers know little or nothing of the books against which they rail.

It would be easy for such a man to listen to Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, call him a decadent, and then betake himself cheerfully to bed, sustained and soothed by the reflection that he had done society a service.

Mr. Loeffler, however, is no more to be snuffed out by such orthodox breath than is Verlaine or Maeterlinck. Whether he is or is not a decadent is not the question; the question is this: Is the music good or bad? or you may put the question in this way: Does the music thrill or move or console me, or does it bore me?

While it is true that program-music should be of musical worth and musical interest without the aid of a detailed program, the composer of such music has a right to demand of the hearer some acquaintance with the drama or myth or picture or poem which he attempts to illustrate musically.

He has a right to choose any subject. In making use of external suggestions he must first of all be musically interesting. He must not hope to save himself when imagination fails and thought is dry by shrieking the Macedonian cry, "Oh, Maeterlinck, save me!"

Mr. Loeffler is too sane a man, too fine an artist to fall into the error of panoramic detail. Maeterlinck's drama is full of suspense, horror, death. Who are the Queen and her handmaids? Who are the child and his sisters, one of whom is faithful to the end? The wild fanfares in Mr. Loeffler's music recall the memory of old Aglovale, who, weak in mind and body, remembers vague heroic days. Is the night wild only for Tintagiles or for those without the castle?

This wild night, the memory of old, heroic deeds, the awful struggle between the cruel and the weak—these are expressed with uncommon musical intensity and not merely through the association of literary ideas. Marvelous orchestration! Strange and fascinating individuality!

I wish, however, that Mr. Loeffler had not made such liberal employment of the two violes d'amour. I see his purpose. The strange, unearthly tones would make a remarkable contrast, and the peevishness in the complaint would suit the character of the doomed boy.

There is nothing that so soon becomes intolerable as that which at first excited attention by its uncommonness.

Mr. Loeffler might answer, "You still remember the effect of those violes." Yes, I hear them now. Perhaps after all, he was wise in his choice.

I hope the piece will soon be played again. To judge of it dogmatically after two hearings would be absurd.

My impressions to-day, however, are the same as those of a week ago: The music will not out of one's thoughts: it is a single proof of the extraordinary orchestral genius of the composer; there are passages that are overwhelming in their fire and passion and despair; but when I recall the other works of Mr. Loeffler I do not believe that the "Death of Tintagiles marks an unmistakable advance in his career. I know of no other man now living who could have written this particular work, with its particular effects; but I believe that Mr. Loeffler will yet write works superior to it in musical thought and musical authority. At present he is too curious, perhaps, in the pursuit of extraordinary expression. There is a limit to fantastic language. Maeterlinck himself is simple in speech to the verge of austerity. Mr. Loeffler should not value unduly things which are external. A man should have the liberty of expressing his thoughts in the way that seems best to him; but he should not become intoxicated by his own rhetoric. I am sure that the fastidious taste, the high ideals of Mr. Loeffler will save him from depending too much on novel tonal effects for a success that his indisputable natural gifts will surely give him.

* * *

The followed Brahms' fourth symphony, which gives me small delight. I heard the first movement only. It was played in dull, lethargic fashion, whereas Mr. Loeffler's piece was performed with a superb display of maestria.

* * *

The program of the twelfth symphony concert, given January 15, included Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Massenet's incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Errinyes," and Smetana's overture to the "Sold Bride." I believe the Massenet suite was performed here for the first time. The 'cello solo in the "Invocation" was played beautifully by Mr. Schroeder, and the "Entr'acte" and "Danse Grecque" were not without interest. The finale—"Danse des Saturnales"—reveals the Frenchman of the students' balls, but as a whole the music is well made and leads one to speculation as to what Massenet might not have done if he too had not chosen to worship in music at the shrine of the great Parisian goddess.

Mr. T. Adamowski fiddled Beethoven's "Romanza" in F major, and Ladislas Gorski's transcription for solo and orchestra of Paganini's "Caprice" in A minor, op. 1. His intonation was often faulty. The Romanza was without breadth or repose, and in the Caprice, although there were happy moments, the bravura as a rule caused uneasiness in the breast of the hearers.

VISITING ORCHESTRAS.

It is lamentable in regard to the recent remarks of Mr. Seidl that New York is really dependent on its orchestral music to visiting organizations, as it has no genuine permanent orchestra. The Philharmonic is a band of mummies that even the efforts of Seidl cannot galvanize into a semblance of life, and the so-called New York Symphony Orchestra is a mere shell. Sousa's Band shows more discipline in its playing than either of these so-called orchestras. To be sure Mrs. Thurber has a permanent orchestra scheme, but it is yet a secret. So it has come to pass that the visits of the Boston Symphony and the Chicago Symphony orchestras are hailed by music lovers as genuinely delightful events. Without them New York could not make good its claim to being a musical city. For years the Boston orchestra has given us all that is new, vital and finished in orchestral music. And now the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with Theodore Thomas at its head, is announced to pay us a visit in six weeks.

The ability of Mr. Thomas as a maker of programs—he has not his equal in the country—and his eclectic taste, all promise much enjoyment and profit for the music lover. It is two years since Mr. Thomas last visited us, and since then his orchestra has been strengthened besides being arduously rehearsed, for its conductor is a stern disciplinarian. No one has preserved the classical tradition as has Mr. Thomas, and the brilliancy and power of his band is remarkable. So we might as well submit gracefully to our visitors and yield to them the palm of superiority in the matter of music making. It might also be a good thing if the members of the Philharmonic Society and of the so-called Symphony Society attended the concerts of the organizations from Chicago and Boston. Not only would they learn much, but they might also hear much to ponder.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

Jan 22

NORDICA

Insults the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Which Retaliates at a Concert.

New York, Jan. 22.—Whenever distinguished soloists, vocal or instrumental, appear at first-class orchestral concerts like those of the Philharmonic Symphony society and Boston Symphony orchestra, the applause which greets them as they retire from the stage is usually twofold. It comes not only from the audience, but also from the orchestra. The violinists turn their instruments over and rap them smartly with their bows, and the other instrumentalists clap their hands.

This is not only considered the soloist's due, but is regarded as an almost peremptory act of courtesy.

It was, therefore, very noticeable on Thursday night at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Metropolitan Opera House that, as Mme. Nordica retired after singing "Ah Perfido" and Elizabeth's entrance aria from "Tannhauser," not a violin was turned in the orchestra, nor did any member of it applaud her.

Yesterday it was rumored that at the rehearsal for the concert something had occurred that annoyed Mme. Nordica, and that she sharply reprimanded the orchestra for the manner in which they accompanied her.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not composed of conservatory pupils. It is acknowledged to be the finest body of instrumentalists in the United States, and one of the best in the world. It resented the cutting remarks made by Mme. Nordica by not applauding her at the concert.

Prominent members of the orchestra confirmed the rumor yesterday.

One of them said: "We had to rehearse under difficulties. We were crowded in a corner of the Metropolitan opera house stage. A ballet rehearsal was going on at the same time. The light was poor, and we had to stand up.

"In the Wagner selection, in which an unusual cut had been made, the violoncellos came in wrong. Mme. Nordica turned around and said sharply, 'That's like a Kalamazoo orchestra,' and this to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"There was quite a breeze over it, I assure you. We were exceedingly indignant. For that reason we did not applaud her at the concert. But she has probably never sung to a finer accompaniment than we gave her."

An effort was made last night to see Mme. Nordica at her hotel, but she had retired.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1898.

(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

NORDICA WAS SLIGHTED.

NEW YORK, Jan. 22.—Because it is customary and considered almost a peremptory act of courtesy for an orchestra as well as the audience to applaud a distinguished soloist, the omission of this tribute to Mme. Lillian Nordica by the Boston Symphony at the Metropolitan Opera House, Thursday night, was very noticeable.

According to statements from some of the Symphony men, the slight was intentional and warranted by the feelings of the players. It is explained that, at a rehearsal for the concert, something occurred in the orchestral accompaniment that annoyed Mme. Nordica, and she, turning sharply, exclaimed: "That's like a Kalamazoo orchestra." This the musicians resented.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1898.

The Eleventh Symphony Concert was given January 8, in Music Hall. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's smug overture to "Ruy Blas," which has not been played at these concerts since the season of 1891-'92, and no wonder. You remember that Mendelssohn described the play as "really of no value—absolutely below contempt—wretched." What a finical Miss he was! The overture, the result of a cross between the beer garden and the salon, reminded me of Aubrey Beardsley's biting caricature of the composer.

* * *

After this overture came the latest composition of Charles Martin Loeffler, symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles" (after the drama by Maeterlinck), for orchestra, and two violes d'amour obbligate (MS). It was the first performance. The violes d'amour were played by Mr. Kneisel and the composer.

This piece is scored for one piccolo, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, one bass clarinet (the part, however, was given at the concert to a double bass clarinet, played by Mr. Kohl, of New York, the inventor), four horns, two trumpets, two cornets, three trombones, one bass tuba, two pairs of kettle drums, cymbals, bass drum, gong, two harps, two violes d'amour and the usual strings.

Let me now quote a few lines from Mr. Apthorp's program book: "From a poetico-dramatic point of view the two violes d'amour, which never appear separated, may be taken as the musical incarnation of the characters of the child Tintagiles and his sister, Ygraine, in Maeterlinck's drama, but the music in nowise seeks to follow out the action of the drama, scene by scene, but rather to depict the struggle between two opposing forces—the Queen and her Handmaids on the one hand and Tintagiles and Ygraine on the other."

My friend, Mr. Apthorp, was delighted to find that Mr. Loeffler did not neglect wholly the sonata form. Whether he neglected it or respected it is to me of little moment.

Do you remember what Smetana wrote to Joseph Srb explaining his quartet, "Aus meinem Leben?"

"I send you herewith the score of a string quartet, which is in manuscript, and until now has never been out of my hands. I gladly leave the style to the judgment of another, and I shall not be offended if it does not please, because it is opposed to the style in which all preceding quartets have been composed. It was not my intention to make a quartet after a set receipt and in conventional form. As a youngster at school I studied theory sufficiently, so that I know what style means, and I am master of it. I prefer to have circumstances determine form. And so I wrote this quartet in the form which it itself demanded."

Now, suppose the hearer to be without knowledge of Maeterlinck's little drama, which is to me one of the most moving and pathetic works of literary man. Suppose the piece were entitled simply Symphonic Poem.

He would—and he is the stumbling-block at the beginning—at least I think he would at once become conscious of warring elements, in nature or in the mind of human persons. He would admire the swing and the passion of the opening; he would find the more cantabile motive of greater breadth and more sustained swoop than is often the case in Mr. Loeffler's music. The cantilena in the bass clarinet, accompanied by the violes d'amour, in thirds would change his mood. He would be reminded of battle or triumph by the fanfares. He would hear complaint in the wailing of the violes d'amour. He would count twelve strokes of the harps and think of midnight, for on the stage the stroke of twelve never announces noon. Renewed strife and passion and complaint until the final dying away of the cantabile theme which returned to the violes d'amour.

He would say, rembering that this is the first serious work of Mr. Loeffler which is purely orchestral, "The man knows a marvelous use of the orchestra; he has found out combinations and tonal effects that did not exist before this in orchestral literature. Occasionally he errs, perhaps; for instance I find one speech of the muted trumpet incongruous and destructive; but in ensemble and in detail there are frequent revelations of orchestral genius. To me he is a greater colorist than Richard Strauss."

And to all this I would agree. But what would he say to the violes d'amour? Might he not say, "Truly an interesting instrument, historically, and I am glad to hear it. Yet I find the sweet-sick complaint soon becomes indescribably monotonous and irritating to the nerves. I suppose he chose the two violes for an express purpose. I think he made a mistake; or at least he used them too much. For the very measures that he thought would thus be most effective are to me less impressive than the other portions of the work. And yet I shall never forget how they sounded. And even now I hear the voice of their complaint."

* * *

From time to time articles aginst "decadents" in music are written and published. Writers will name Ibsen, Zola, Verlaine and Maeterlinck in a sentence, declaim bitterly against the lot, and censure musicians who derive any kind of inspiration from the works of such wretched beings. The very grouping shows that these declaimers know little or nothing of the books against which they rail.

It would be easy for such a man to listen to Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem, call him a decadent, and then betake himself cheerfully to bed, sustained and soothed by the reflection that he had done society a service.

Mr. Loeffler, however, is no more to be snuffed out by such orthodox breath than is Verlaine or Maeterlinck. Whether he is or is not a decadent is not the question; the question is this: Is the music good or bad? or you may put the question in this way: Does the music thrill or move or console me, or does it bore me?

While it is true that program-music should be of musical worth and musical interest without the aid of a detailed program, the composer of such music has a right to demand of the hearer some acquaintance with the drama or myth or picture or poem which he attempts to illustrate musically.

He has a right to choose any subject. In making use of external suggestions he must first of all be musically interesting. He must not hope to save himself when imagination fails and thought is dry by shrieking the Macedonian cry,"Oh, Maeterlinck, save me!"

Mr. Loeffler is too sane a man, too fine an artist to fall into the error of panoramic detail. Maeterlinck's drama is full of suspense, horror, death. Who are the Queen and her handmaids? Who are the child and his sisters, one of whom is faithful to the end? The wild fanfares in Mr. Loeffler's music recall the memory of old Aglovale, who, weak in mind and body, remembers vague heroic days. Is the night wild only for Tintagiles or for those without the castle?

This wild night, the memory of old, heroic deeds, the awful struggle between the cruel and the weak—these are expressed with uncommon musical intensity and not merely through the association of literary ideas. Marvelous orchestration! Strange and fascinating individuality!

I wish, however, that Mr. Loeffler had not made such liberal employment of the two violes d'amour. I see his purpose. The strange, unearthly tones would make a remarkable contrast, and the peevishness in the complaint would suit the character of the doomed boy.

There is nothing that so soon becomes intolerable as that which at first excited attention by its uncommonness.

Mr. Loeffler might answer, "You still remember the effect of those violes." Yes, I hear them now. Perhaps after all, he was wise in his choice.

I hope the piece will soon be played again. To judge of it dogmatically after two hearings would be absurd.

My impressions to-day, however, are the same as those of a week ago: The music will not out of one's thoughts: it is a single proof of the extraordinary orchestral genius of the composer; there are passages that are overwhelming in their fire and passion and despair; but when I recall the other works of Mr. Loeffler I do not believe that the "Death of Tintagiles marks an unmistakable advance in his career. I know of no other man now living who could have written this particular work, with its particular effects; but I believe that Mr. Loeffler will yet write works superior to it in musical thought and musical authority. At present he is too curious, perhaps, in the pursuit of extraordinary expression. There is a limit to fantastic language. Maeterlinck himself is simple in speech to the verge of austerity. Mr. Loeffler should not value unduly things which are external. A man should have the liberty of expressing his thoughts in the way that seems best to him; but he should not become intoxicated by his own rhetoric. I am sure that the fastidious taste, the high ideals of Mr. Loeffler will save him from depending too much on novel tonal effects for a success that his indisputable natural gifts will surely give him.

* * *

The followed Brahms' fourth symphony, which gives me small delight. I heard the first movement only. It was played in dull, lethargic fashion, whereas Mr. Loeffler's piece was performed with a superb display of maestria.

* * *

The program of the twelfth symphony concert, given January 15, included Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Massenet's incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Errinyes," and Smetana's overture to the "Sold Bride." I believe the Massenet suite was performed here for the first time. The 'cello solo in the "Invocation" was played beautifully by Mr. Schroeder, and the "Entr'acte" and "Danse Grecque" were not without interest. The finale—"Danse des Saturnales"—reveals the Frenchman of the students' balls, but as a whole the music is well made and leads one to speculation as to what Massenet might not have done if he too had not chosen to worship in music at the shrine of the great Parisian goddess.

Mr. T. Adamowski fiddled Beethoven's "Romanza" in F major, and Ladislas Gorski's transcription for solo and orchestra of Paganini's "Caprice" in A minor, op. 1. His intonation was often faulty. The Romanza was without breadth or repose, and in the Caprice, although there were happy moments, the bravura as a rule caused uneasiness in the breast of the hearers.

VISITING ORCHESTRAS.

It is lamentable in regard to the recent remarks of Mr. Seidl that New York is really dependent on its orchestral music to visiting organizations, as it has no genuine permanent orchestra. The Philharmonic is a band of mummies that even the efforts of Seidl cannot galvanize into a semblance of life, and the so-called New York Symphony Orchestra is a mere shell. Sousa's Band shows more discipline in its playing than either of these so-called orchestras. To be sure Mrs. Thurber has a permanent orchestra scheme, but it is yet a secret. So it has come to pass that the visits of the Boston Symphony and the Chicago Symphony orchestras are hailed by music lovers as genuinely delightful events. Without them New York could not make good its claim to being a musical city. For years the Boston orchestra has given us all that is new, vital and finished in orchestral music. And now the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with Theodore Thomas at its head, is announced to pay us a visit in six weeks.

The ability of Mr. Thomas as a maker of programs—he has not his equal in the country—and his eclectic taste, all promise much enjoyment and profit for the music lover. It is two years since Mr. Thomas last visited us, and since then his orchestra has been strengthened besides being arduously rehearsed, for its conductor is a stern disciplinarian. No one has preserved the classical tradition as has Mr. Thomas, and the brilliancy and power of his band is remarkable. So we might as well submit gracefully to our visitors and yield to them the palm of superiority in the matter of music making. It might also be a good thing if the members of the Philharmonic Society and of the so-called Symphony Society attended the concerts of the organizations from Chicago and Boston. Not only would they learn much, but they might also hear much to ponder.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

NORDICA

Insults the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Which Retaliates at a Concert.

New York, Jan. 22.—Whenever distinguished soloists, vocal or instrumental, appear at first-class orchestral concerts like those of the Philharmonic Symphony society and Boston Symphony orchestra, the applause which greets them as they retire from the stage is usually twofold. It comes not only from the audience, but also from the orchestra. The violinists turn their instruments over and rap them smartly with their bows, and the other instrumentalists clap their hands.

This is not only considered the soloist's due, but is regarded as an almost peremptory act of courtesy.

It was, therefore, very noticeable on Thursday night at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Metropolitan Opera House that, as Mme. Nordica retired after singing "Ah Perfido" and Elizabeth's entrance aria from "Tannhauser," not a violin was turned in the orchestra, nor did any member of it applaud her.

Yesterday it was rumored that at the rehearsal for the concert something had occurred that annoyed Mme. Nordica, and that she sharply reprimanded the orchestra for the manner in which they accompanied her.

Now the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not composed of conservatory pupils. It is acknowledged to be the finest body of instrumentalists in the United States, and one of the best in the world. It resented the cutting remarks made by Mme. Nordica by not applauding her at the concert.

Prominent members of the orchestra confirmed the rumor yesterday.

One of them said: "We had to rehearse under difficulties. We were crowded in a corner of the Metropolitan opera house stage. A ballet rehearsal was going on at the same time. The light was poor, and we had to stand up.

"In the Wagner selection, in which an unusual cut had been made, the violoncellos came in wrong. Mme. Nordica turned around and said sharply, 'That's like a Kalamazoo orchestra,' and this to the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"There was quite a breeze over it, I assure you. We were exceedingly indignant. For that reason we did not applaud her at the concert. But she has probably never sung to a finer accompaniment than we gave her."

An effort was made last night to see Mme. Nordica at her hotel, but she had retired.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 23, 1898.

(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

NORDICA WAS SLIGHTED.

NEW YORK, Jan. 22.—Because it is customary and considered almost a peremptory act of courtesy for an orchestra as well as the audience to applaud a distinguished soloist, the omission of this tribute to Mme. Lillian Nordica by the Boston Symphony at the Metropolitan Opera House, Thursday night, was very noticeable.

According to statements from some of the Symphony men, the slight was intentional and warranted by the feelings of the players. It is explained that, at a rehearsal for the concert, something occurred in the orchestral accompaniment that annoyed Mme. Nordica, and she, turning sharply, exclaimed: "That's like a Kalamazoo orchestra." This the musicians resented.

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, Jan. 21, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening's concert of the Boston orchestra was a great improvement on its preceding one at the Metropolitan. There was no trace of slovenliness, no danger of collapse, no brass-choir out of tune with the rest of the band, and the programme was more interesting. Mme. Nordica was the soloist last evening, and the audience was large and enthusiastic. She sang Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido," and afterwards Elisabeth's greeting from Tannhäuser" in a way that contrasted most agreeably with Frau Gadski's efforts with the same number on the preceding evening. She was in excellent voice, and the natural beauty of her voice as well as her artistic training never appeared to greater advantage than in these two selections. The audience tried its very best to get an encore, but Mr. Paur stuck manfully to the good rules of the Boston organization.

The concert began with the Academic Festival Overture by the late Johannes Brahms. That eminent composer was noted for his rudeness; perhaps everybody has heard the ben trovato story of his leaving a party one evening with the remark "I beg pardon if perchance there is any one here whom I have not offended." He seldom answered a letter, and when the English University of Cambridge sent him an invitation to come and be made a doctor of music, he did not go or even acknowledge receipt of the invitation. Perhaps his conscience bit him for that; at any rate, when the University of Breslau wanted to doctor him, he did not put out his tongue contemptuously, but went and put on the cap and toga like a good fellow. More than that, he composed for the occasion his Academic overture, which is one of his most pleasing works. Here he did not have to hunt laboriously for ideas or "crib" them (he was nearly as big a thief as Handel, though more subtly so), but legitimately appropriated some German songs beloved of students—"Wir hatten gebauet ein stattliches Haus," "Was Kommt da von der Höh," and "Gaudeamus igitur"—and worked them up into a tone-poem. This piece was admirably played by Mr. Paur and his men; and the same may be said of the suite "Les Erynnies," with which Massenet established his fame in 1876. This music is facile, pleasing, bright, though it can hardly be said that it breathes the antique Greek spirit more realistically than Mendelssohn's "Antigone," which an eminent musician sneered at as "Berliner Liedertafel-musik." Least Greek of all is the ultra-sentimental Invocation in No. 3—a broad, intense melody for muted violoncello; but that made it none the less beautiful, and it is lucky that Massenet used it for his famous song known as the Elegie, with 'cello obligato. Mr. Schroeder played this melody exquisitely, and the audience would have been ever so glad to hear it again.

Less praise can be accorded the performance of Dvorák's "New World Symphony," one of our Philharmonic's war-horses, which it plays not only with greater technical finish than the Bostonians do, but with infinitely more expression. Mr. Paur is too thoroughly Teutonic to quite catch the spirit of this Bohemian music; for Dvorák remains a Bohemian even when he blackens his music with a cork to make it suggest the American negro. The rhythmic vigor is Bohemian, and it takes Mr. Seidl to bring that out. The most disappointing movement, however, was the largo. Dr. Dvorák had at first marked that andante, but when he heard Mr. Seidl conduct it largo at a Philharmonic rehearsal he took his pencil and marked it as Seidl played it. Mr. Paur, quite the contrary, finding it marked largo, went and played it andante, thereby robbing it of all its tearful pathos which the Philharmonic brings out so inimitably. It was noticeable, too, how Mr. Paur failed to bring out that Parsifal-like crescendo in the first movement. The dramatic possibilities of the symphony escape him; he plays it without expression. In brilliant music that simply calls for virtuosity, à la Rosenthal, the Boston orchestra is incomparable; but its playing never has the expressiveness of a Paderewski or a Seidl performance; and after all an ounce of expression is worth a hundred pounds of virtuosity, and a single tear is more eloquent applause than the hand-clapping of thousands.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS.
Broadway and Fulton St. New York
FRIDAY EVENING, JANUARY 21, 1898.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Dr. Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," has been peculiarly identified with New York concert rooms. Here it was brought out in 1893 by the Philharmonic Society, and here it has been played, probably a dozen times since, by all of the four standard orchestras that New York hears in a twelvemonth, the Philharmonic, the New York Symphony, the Boston Symphony and the Chicago organizations. Between the efforts of this quartet of musical forces, the strength and beauty of Dvorak's work have been revealed in nearly their full values, and the public has had exceptional opportunities to study and compare readings of it.

Last night the Bohemian composer's symphony was again placed before local music lovers, this time by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House. Mr. Paur, who conducted, had put it at the end of a considerable programme, but it suffered less from that than might have been supposed. Mr. Paur and his men were in their usual good form, and technical difficulties had no more terrors for them than usual, which means that they almost imperceptibly surmounted obstacles that would have proven serious to less experienced and well-drilled bodies of musicians. The symphony, however, calls for more than technical proficiency, and Mr. Paur surprised at least some of his hearers by denying to its first two movements the sensuous charm that he generally imparts to it. The different voices sounded too much detached and isolated from one another. The physical characteristics of the music, if one may use the expression, were emphasized at the expense of the spiritual. The massive quality that seems so eminently suited to this symphony was strangely absent during these first two movements. The orchestral tone actually sounded thin and meager. Impressiveness is very well at times, but in this case it seemed as though Mr. Paur pushed it too far. The second movement, with its lovely melody, is one in which tempo rubato is most appropriate, but last night the air was sung and repeated in nearly ironclad time, except at the very end of the phrase. It failed to exercise its full power.

The latter two movements, on the other hand, were played with appreciation and a strong sense of their beauty and eloquence.

A novelty that was extremely interesting was the incidental music by Jules Massenet to Leconte de Lisle's "Les Erinnyes" ("The Furies"). The drama is a study of the Aeschylus Orestean Trilogy and was brought out in Paris in 1873. In 1876, the play was again performed, this time with additional incidental music by Massenet, the whole consisting of an "Entr 'acte," labelled andante appassionato; a second movement, called a "Grecian Dance," which is a long pallet piece in three connected divisions; a "Scene Religieuse," andantino, and a finale marked "allegro tres-decide." While the music is some of the best that Massenet ever wrote, and as Mr. Apthorp puts it in the analytical programme, "was one of the corner stones of Massenet's reputation in France," it does not, of course, give one more than an incomplete suggestion of the drama as a whole. It is literally incidental and the composer chose only the lighter moods of the play for reflection in his score. It is dance music, most of it, of an admirable sort, and only in the first and third movements, which are short, does it bear any more serious aspect. It is less Gallic than much of Massenet's later work, and has a stamp of originality that is unmistakable. Mr. Paur and his men gave to its performance a keen perception of its character, and the result was all that could have been desired. "Les Erinnyes" will bear repetition here in the near future.

The other orchestral number was the Brahams' "Academic Festival Overture," which began the programme in good style. Mme. Nordica was the soloist last night, singing Beethoven's scena and aria, "Ah, Perfido," and "Elizabeth's Greeting" from "Tannhauser." Her voice was not quite up to its usual mark. It sounded a little tired, especially in the second number. The Beethoven scena and aria were sung with crisp, clear enunciation, and not a little dramatic power. Mme. Nordica was fully able to cope with its difficulties, and gave it a very interesting rendering.

The audience last night was one of the largest the Boston Symphony Orchestra has yet drawn in New York, and was inclined to be very demonstrative.

NEW YORK HERALD.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, gave its third concert of the season at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. There was a good sized audience and much applause, both for the orchestra and for the soloist, Mme. Nordica.

The instrumental numbers of the programme were Brahms "Academic Festival Overture," Massenet's suite, "Les Erinnyes" and Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World." The orchestra was especially fine in the "Scene Religieuse" of the Massenet suite, the phrases for 'celli being given with a beautiful singing quality of tone production. The whole Dvorak symphony was superbly played. If one movement deserved to be singled out for particular praise it was the scherzo, which was given with thrilling swing and dash.

In the more dramatic phrases of the difficult Beethoven scena and aria, "Ah! perfido," Mme. Nordica's first selection, she rather sacrificed tone quality to expression. But her second selection, "Elizabeth's Greeting," from "Tannhauser" was admirably sung and well deserved the hearty applause it evoked.

The Commercial Advertiser.
By The Commercial Advertiser Association.
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 21, 1898.

New York is at last coming to a full realization of the manifold excellences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and is patronizing its concerts in a way to show its appreciation of the fine work of that band. Another great audience greeted Mr. Paur and his men at the Metropolitan Opera House last night and was well repaid for its trouble by an exceedingly interesting concert. There was but one novelty on the programme and that was a novelty only as a whole for parts of Massenet's incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's Les Erinnyes have already been heard here. The rest of the programme was made up of Brahms's Academic Overture, Dvorak's From the New World symphony, while Mme. Nordica sang two numbers, Beethoven's aria, Ah, Perfido! and Dich Theure Halle from Tannhäuser.

The Massenet music consists of four parts, an Entr'acte, a Grecian Dance, a Scene Religieuse and the Finale. It was first played at the Odéon, in Paris, in 1873 in a simpler form, then re-written and produced again in 1876, and really formed the foundation of Massenet's reputation. Its melodies are fresh, its orchestration brilliant and its dances entrancing, but the thought inevitably comes to one that there is little of the spirit of Aeschylean tragedy in it. Just what de Lisle's version of the great Greek tragedy is we do not know, but it has probably suffered in his hands the refining process that the French have ever inflicted on Greek drama until the severity, the austerity and simplicity of Aeschylus has been almost wholly lost. Massenet's music is oftentimes glitteringly trivial and thus inappropriate to the great drama of The Furies. Considered, however, as music, divorced from the composer's purpose, there is much in it to make it a valuable addition to a repertory. It has color, warmth and passion; its dance movements, especially the ballet-divertissement, are in Massenet's best style, and the third movement contains an exquisite passage sung on a muted 'cello, a thing that is pathetic in the extreme, but at the same time lacks, as do the other parts, the nobility always associated with Greek drama. Aeschylus made gods of his men and women, but Massenet's music is essentially human and French.

The work served well to exhibit the virtuosity of the band, especially in the florid passages of the second and fourth parts. There was a masterly precision in all parts; each voice of the orchestra was felt and understood, and the rich coloring was laid on with a sure and sympathetic hand. Mr. Alwyn Schroeder's playing of the cantilena in the third part was an exquisite piece of work and well deserved the hearty applause that followed it.

The Brahms Overture was played in a very polished fashion, almost too polished one might be tempted to say, for there seemed at times too little rudeness and strength in the characteristic rhythms. Dvorak's symphony has already been heard here this winter and is very familiar to our audiences. The criticism applied to the Brahms Overture might be made of the first movement of the symphony. It was too polished, too refined, and therefore lacked some of the glowing color that can be put into it. The other three movements were the perfection of orchestral playing.

Mme. Nordica sang Beethoven's air in a full, beautiful, vigorous voice that seemed to have as much power in reserve as she had expended. In the second number, however, the Dich Theure Halle, her voice seemed at times a bit tired and husky, as if she sang with effort. She was most enthusiastically received.

New-York Daily Tribune.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

It is a petty, illiberal and shortsighted spirit which can begrudge the Boston Symphony Orchestra the popularity which it is enjoying in New-York this season. By providing such splendid audiences as that which attended the third concert at the Metropolitan Opera House, without sacrificing any of its duty toward our own organizations (why should it?), the city is honoring itself and giving testimony to the sincerity and intelligence of its love for the highest forms of music. We know of no more faithful, no finer audiences in the world than those of the Philharmonic concerts, and that the audiences which the Boston organization has won for itself are quite as gentle, quite as appreciative, and more demonstrative in their expressions of delight ought not to give offence to either local or foreign observer. The world is large enough for all, and comparisons need not be made except to inculcate a lesson imperatively needed. It was a fine thing to hear a concert like that of last night, and a gladsome thing that it found such hearty appreciation. The programme was made up of delights: Brahms's Academic overture, four numbers of the incidental music composed by Massenet for Leconte de Lisle's antique tragedy, "Les Erinnyes," and Dvorák's symphony, "From the New World"—these were the orchestral numbers. To them were added two grand airs, sung by Mme. Nordica—Beethoven's "Ah, Perfido" and Wagner's "Dichtheure Halle," from "Tannhäuser." To dispose of this feature of the concert, let it be said, with entire consciousness of the meaning of the words, that Mme. Nordica has never appeared in our concert-rooms to better advantage. Her voice was in perfect condition, her willingness eager, her ambition boundless, her intelligence and feeling wholly adequate. And so she sang radiantly, gloriously. So also did the orchestra play in all its numbers, leaving for the local critic, brought up on Mr. Seidl's reading of Dr. Dvorák's American symphony only a chance to quarrel with his tempi of the first two movements, with which after several hearings we confess our inability to become reconciled. But the orchestra gave great pleasure.

The Massenet music was practically new in New-York. Mr. Van der Stucken brought it forward (including the prelude, which in justice to the composer, ought not to be omitted) some ten years ago, and Mr. Seidl has played one of its numbers since. It is deserving of more attention, for M. Massenet's melodic gifts do not appear to better advantage in any of his works. It should, however, be heard with a knowledge of the French poet's treatment of the Orestean tragedy in mind. Especially is this true of the slow movement for muted violoncello solo, which Mr. Schroeder played so ravishingly last night that the audience strained its rights of courtesy to compel a repetition. The melody is that to which Massenet adapted the song known as "Elegie." In the play it is the instrumental part of a melodrama—Electra's invocation of the divinities and shade of her father as she pours out the libation at Agamemnon's tomb.

The New York Times.
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 21, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

An Interesting Novelty by Massenet at the Third Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House last night was one of the most delightful entertainments which that delightfully entertaining organization has ever given here. It was attended by a large audience, which, according to a time-dishonored custom, spent most of its enthusiasm upon the solo features. When will the New York public reach that beatific state of musical culture in which the creation of the composer is regarded as of more importance than the musician who performs it?

The programme last night consisted of the Academic overture of Brahms, the dramatic scena, "Ah, perfido," of Beethoven; Jules Massenet's incidental music to "Les Erinnyes," an antique drama by Charles Marie Leconte de Lisle, the air "Dich Theure Halle" from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and Dr. Antonin Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World." The singer was Mme. Lillian Nordica.

The incidental music composed by Massenet for De Lisle's modern imitation of Aeschylus is one of the most satisfactory productions of the gifted Frenchman. It possesses what much of his opera music—not all of it—lacks, and that is character. This music of Massenet, saturated as it is with those traits of the French nature which make a Frenchman the Greek of the modern world, has an atmosphere of its own. It makes the hearer think of Gluck, and Gluck was as near to the modern conception of Greek in his music as it seems possible to be.

Aside from its character this music is conspicuously beautiful in its thematic ideas and in the chaste clearness of its form and orchestral treatment. It is admirably made from beginning to end, and gives a satisfying impression of grace. It was most excellently played last night, and the 'cello solo in the invocation at the close of the "Scène Religieuse" was played with so much beauty of tone and expression by Mr. Alwyn Schroeder that it called forth long-continued applause.

The "Academic Overture" was played with an abundance of precision and spirit and the Dvorak symphony with great attention to details, albeit Mr. Paur showed a disposition unduly to hurry the tempi here and there, particularly in the first movement. But the performance was, on the whole, admirable.

Mme. Nordica was in superb voice, and she sang both her arias in a manner that left nothing to be desired. Her stature as an interpreter of dramatic music is constantly growing, and in the Beethoven air last night she soared to splendid heights. After the Wagner air the audience fought hard for an encore, but Mr. Paur does not permit the Sunday night habit to prevail in his presence. May his tribe increase.

The World
by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PAR
New York.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, 1898.

A CONCERT OF TRIUMPHS.

The Boston Musicians and Nordica Rouse a Storm of Enthusiastic Applause at the Opera-House.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid New York its third visit yesterday. These visits are veritable benisons. They give the music-lovers absolution for the sins committed in the support and approval of local mediocrity. They are delightful in themselves and should be beneficial, but unfortunately they happen at long intervals and the standard they set is forgotten in the intervening weeks. The accusation that New York is lacking in musical judgment gains weight when the fact is recorded that inferior performances, day after day, are as warmly applauded as were the superlative achievements of Mr. Paur's musicians at the Metropolitan Opera-House last evening.

The programme was an interesting one, but it lacked, in the main, the degree of novelty, which would be welcome. With its large repertoire the Boston Orchestra has much that is new for New York, and such works as the Brahms Academic overture and Dvorak's "New World" symphony might well be omitted. Still, their concerts are so delightful that anything they give is welcome.

The orchestra played the Brahms number with spirit. The symphony was played with greater polish than is generally given to it in local performances. This was a merit in the second movement, which was sung with exquisite smoothness, but a little more rude energy and a stronger accentuation of the characteristic rhythms throughout the opus would have been better. Some of the tempi in the last movement were open to question. The Massenet suite, "Les Erinnyes," was undoubtedly selected to exhibit the extraordinary virtuosity of the orchestra. In the "Entr'acte" the passionate passage for the violins in unison, with its rushing scales and its tremendous trills, was executed with masterly precision. The invocation in the "Scene Religieuse"—a 'cello solo on the muted instrument—was played with ravishing beauty by Mr. Alwin Schroeder. By omitting the coda Mr. Paur permitted his 'cellist to reap the audience's bountiful applause. There is more melodic beauty in this suite of Massenet's than in a half-dozen of his later works.

Nordica was the soloist. She was in superb voice. She sang Beethoven's "Ah! Perfido" and Elizabeth's "Dich Theure Halle," from "Tannhaeuser," with tremendous breadth, fervor, dramatic expression and feeling. Her voice was rich, round, full, vibrant. In its vigor there was always the suggestion of reserve force. The woman's heart was in her song and her accents thrilled the listeners.

The audience was one of the largest the Symphony Orchestra has drawn to the Metropolitan Opera-House. Its applause came in tempests for both the musicians and the singer.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 21, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Features of the Third Concert—Nordica Heard Again to Advantage.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Society, heard last evening in the Metropolitan, gave a mixture of many excellent things. The whole effect was in a way kaleidoscopic, a general sense of color and variety being essentially heightened by Dvorak's symphony, "The New World," with which the concert ended. This work is, in all but the largo movement, a sort of bright colored mosaic or patchwork—glittering, dazzling, not really formless, but so restless and ever moving as to appear more like a gay fluttering banner than anything with stationary outlines. "The New World" has been frequently played here, and excellently, so that Mr. Paur's rendering had in it nothing either astonishing or instructive, unless it be the lesson his orchestra always teaches, which is how to show the different tone colors of the many varying instruments in the band to the utmost extent and the fullest advantage, and how to give the strongest possible accent to every changing rhythm. These are two great points in the execution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A beautiful suite by Jules Massenet, which, though written more than twenty years ago, has never before been played here, was given last night, and should prove of inestimable value in the making of future concert schemes, for one must travel far and seek diligently before he can find anything more original and entrancing. The suite was written as incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's play "Les Erinnyes," which was brought out at the Odéon in Paris in 1873. As presented last night there are four numbers, an entr'acte, a Grecian dance, scène réligieuse and finale. The music is, like all of Massenet's, very seductive, very elegant, very graceful, and very brilliant. It was one of the chief things that served to build up Massenet's fame.

The concert began with Brahms's "Festival Overture," not one of his best works, because it is imbued with less of his dreamy contemplative individuality than most of his writing possesses. But it at least carries his geniality with it and has a modicum of humor, too, as one of the component parts. This overture was written by Brahms in 1881 for his degree of Ph. D. at the University of Breslau.

Mme. Nordica was the soloist of last evening. She sang two large arias with great power of voice and accumulated much applause. Her songs were Beethoven's "Ah Perfido" and "Dich theure Halle."

Philadelphia Inquirer

UESDAY - - - - - JANUARY 18, 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy Last Night.

The Boston Symphony's third concert of the season was given at the Academy of Music last night, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor. This was the program:

Schumann Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120.
Mozart, Aria, Voi che Sapete, from "Marriage of Figaro."
Massenet, Suite, "Les Erinnyes," (first time).
Recitative and aria, "To Cheat my Love," from Gounod's opera, "Mirella."
Tschaiskowsky, Overture, "1812," in E flat major, Op. 49.
Soloist, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt.

It is true that the work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra may be said to dignify even the commonplace, and yet there is a limit to all things. The strange musical make-up of Mr. Paur has often been commented upon, as also his fondness—shall it be called by that name?—for making the public wonder what he means and what are his theories as to popular taste. Last night it seemed as if he had determined to out-Herod Herod in all his previous bizarre efforts; and to speak plainly, and not in a captious spirit, it must be said that his program was a reflection on the musical intelligence of Philadelphia. Independently of this, the orchestra did not appear to play with its usual spirit, and there were moments, especially in the Schumann symphony, when there were evidences of a dilettante spirit, instead of that co-ordination which has so long been the sign manual of all the players. Schumann's symphonies have always the flavor of piano music, and it was only in the romanza and the trio that the listener could catch in figuration or in harmonic progressions, suggestions of what are supposed to be inherent qualities in this form of music. The work of the strings in the opening and the romanza movements was beyond cavil, but that did not atone for the structural weakness which was so strongly visible. When the first version of the score passed into the possession of Johannes Brahams, he should as he did with the autograph score of Mozart's G minor symphony, have obstinately refused to publish it. As for Massenet's incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's Greek drama, "Les Erinnyes," it had little of the antique spirit. The music which Dr. Hugh A. Clarke, of this city, wrote for the Greek play, "The Acharnians," which was presented some years ago by the students of the University of Pennsylvania at the Academy of Music, was much more classical, and the only thing which redeemed the Massenet music was the cantabile in the scene religieuse. It was played by Mr. Schroeder, the 'cellist, an artist who is perhaps the most sympathetic and artistic master of the 'cello in the world, and his interpretation of it on his instrument, a beautiful Amati, was a marvel and a delight.

The Tschaiskowsky overture was the closing number. It purposes to celebrate the repulse of the Napoleonic invasion of Russia in 1812. It is ultra-melodramatic; it has a half Asiatic crudeness about it; there are wild cries in it like those from the Valkyrie, and the sounds of moving battalions and of attacks; lava pours out, dynamite explodes, fragments of the Marseillaise sound through the tempest, and if there were in addition to booming cannon, tolling bells and the crashing diapason of brasses, a few rifles fired off and the smoke and smell of gunpowder filled the auditorium, the piece would be fit to rank with Massenet's "Navarraise," presented here two seasons ago with Calve, and of which the composer said to a friend of the writer that it was "a bad opera composed after a good dinner."

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the vocalist of the evening, although the presence of a vocalist at a symphony concert is as much in keeping with the fitness of things as would be a collection of etchings side by side with an exhibition of oil paintings. Her voice is well modulated in its middle register, but it is not suited for a building like the Academy, and her upper notes are strident and metallic. She was at her best in the Mozart number, and it must be said sang it, as all the music of that composer should be sung, without any attempt at ornamentation.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, January 18, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Academy of Music.

It is some time since Mme. Lillian Blauvelt has been heard in Philadelphia, and there was considerable expectation among local music lovers concerning the manner in which she would acquit herself as soloist at the Boston Symphony concert last evening. The result was gratifying in the extreme. Mme. Blauvelt's voice, although of no great volume, is pure and clear, and its carrying power is excellent. It is in coloratura singing that she is at her best, and the numbers she selected last evening were well calculated to show her ability in this direction. Her method is good and simple, a fact particularly noticeable in the classic Mozart aria, "Voi che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro," the piano passages in which were remarkably well rendered. In addition to this, Mme. Blauvelt sang an aria from Gounod's "Mirella," "To Cheat My Love." The novelty of the programme was Massenet's "Les Erinnyes," the incidental music written to an antique drama by Leconte de Lisles. As a concert suite it is somewhat disappointing, the music being of a descriptive nature which seems to require the dramatic action it was written to accompany. The third number, however ("Scene Religieuse"), contains a beautiful solo part for the 'cello, played last evening with great appreciation by Alwin Schraeder, and the entire suite is interesting on account of its brilliant orchestral scoring. Schumann's symphony in D Minor and Tschaikowsky's tumultuous overture, "1812," completed the programme.

PUBLIC LEDGER
AND DAILY TRANSCRIPT.
Established 1836.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Jan. 18, 1898.

A symphony concert, with one symphony, a suite and an overture as the sum total of the purely orchestral offerings, might seem to some a hazardous sort of undertaking, but the success of last night's concert (the third of the Boston Orchestra's current season) at the Academy was of the kind to which Conductor Paur might point in proof of his success as a programme builder. Schumann's D minor (Fourth) Symphony was played with a finish that fairly justified the remark made of this work by a great critic, that it is "a blooming web of tone," but some bold conductor who will decide to give this all-in-a-piece symphony minus some of the interminable repetitions that characterize it—and particularly the final movement—will probably gain the gratitude of a majority of his listeners.

The "Erinnyes" suite of Massenet is an ideal piece—or set of pieces—of "programme" music. After an introductory ("entr'act") for strings only, and in which that division of the band played splendidly, comes a "Grecian dance" movement, for all the world like some of the humorously eccentric music Sullivan used to work in with a Gilbert libretto, and then a lovely andante ("scene religieuse") in which the first 'cellist had an obligato whose performance called forth the heartiest applause evoked during the evening, the suite ending in a Finale in which Massenet has done wonders of workmanship with themes rather tawdry in themselves. As a whole, however, this suite is one of the most taking works of this poetical and graceful writer.

Madame Lillian Blauvelt won a triple recall and plenty of applause by the beautiful way in which she sang the Voi che sapete from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," with sweetness of tone and sympathetic expression. Afterward she sang the recitative and aria "To Cheat My Love," from Gounod's "Mirella," with ample volume of tone and admirable mastery of the technical difficulties that abound in the excerpt.

Tschaikowsky's "1812" or "Holy War" overture, which concluded the concert, was given a performance that made one willing to pardon the omission of the park of artillery and the brass band that the complete score provides. From the moment the first gun was fired (on the kettle drum) until the "Marseillaise" went down in broken measures, under the triumphant strains of the Russian national hymn, there was no lack of sounding brass, clashing cymbals and perfect strenuosity of combined wood-wind and string. There is force in the overture, however, as well as sound, and the audience gave evidence of the fact that it was much impressed. And whether or not the composer provided it, there was at the finish—to make amends for the absent artillery and brass band—the solemn chime of the steel bar that does service for a cathedral bell, and right well it was used in adding to the general effectiveness of this picturesque overture.

The North American
Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1898.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Academy of Music last night in the presence of the usual crowded and distinguished-looking audience, was not one of any notable brilliancy. Indeed, in respect of interest and importance it was distinctly below the standard of the entertainments customarily given by the splendid organization which Mr. Paur directs. The leading number was Schumann's melodious, but not very impressive, symphony in D minor, No. 4, which can hardly be regarded as a composition of the first rank in the class to which it belongs. There were only two other instrumental selections, Massenet's incidental music to Leconte de Lisle's tragedy, "Les Erinnyes," and Tschaikowsky's intolerably vulgar and theatrical overture "1812," and as in addition only a second-rate soloist had been provided, the general result was distinctly unsatisfying and disappointing. It is true that the Massenet suite had not been heard here before. It is extremely graceful, melodious and imaginative, and so, though it is far from suggesting the severity and simplicity of Greek art—in that respect Dr. Hugh A. Clarke's setting of "The Acharnians," produced by the University boys a few years ago, was far finer—it was listened to with pleasure.

It was not, however, sufficient to make up for the deficiencies of a programme singularly and seriously lacking in dignity and weight. These Boston symphony concerts are attended by people who know what is best in music, and who expect that it shall be given to them, and that with some liberality as to measure. They had a right to feel last night that they had not been treated according to their knowledge and their deserts. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and her selections, Mozart's "Voi che Sapete" and the aria "To Cheat My Love," from Gounod's "Mirella," were pleasantly rendered. Mme. Blauvelt's voice is small, but it is good, and her method is excellent, but her style is not broad enough for the Academy, and her music was not judiciously chosen. "Voi che Sapete" belongs to the contralto, and the Gounod air is pretty, but featureless. Neither made any impression, the heartiest applause of the evening going to Mr. Alwin Schroeder for a beautiful little violoncello obligato. The date of the next concert is February 14.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 18, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Fine Programme From the Boston Orchestra With Lillian Blauvelt.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series attracted another large audience, and the programme presented was possibly the most attractive thus far given this season. The Schumann symphony in D minor, while not recognized as the greatest of his works, is one which may be listened to with great interest, especially when its characteristic and somewhat exaggerated Schumann peculiarities are presented in all the delicacy of their eccentricities by such a thorough band of musicians. The orchestra never displayed a more perfect example of exactness in ensemble, nor was the voice of the first violins ever more beautiful or the surprising minuteness of Mr. Paur's conducting more amply illustrated than in the "Ziemlich lang sam." The display which he gave in this number and also in the Grecian dance movement of the Massenet selection and the Tschaikowsky overture of his thorough reading of the score, as it applies to an exact command over, and instruction to, each department of his orchestra gave an assured balance and imparted a confidence to the listener that was most restful. The Massenet selection, "Suite Les Erinnyes," is a potpourri of musical ideas of the Offenbach school interlarded with a few chromatic gems, of which the 'cello "Elegie" is the best, and an entertaining bit of descriptive music, "The Grecian Dances," in which a duet, made beautiful by the exquisite tone of the flutes, and a series of novel progressions between the clarinets and piccolos served to interest the musician and tickle the ear of the amateur. Tschaikowsky overture was delivered with an enthusiasm which brought warmth to the proverbially staid audience that attend these orchestra concerts.

Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist and sang both her programme numbers, "Voi che sapete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and "Mon Coeur," from Gounod's "Mirella," with artistic finish, though she did not equal her previous efforts here. She was evidently indisposed. The Gounod aria was only sung in part, a most beautiful and integral portion of it being omitted, and she avoided the principal and famous cadenza at the close of the number and adopted the substitution. The audience favored her with many recalls, and also gave Herr Schweder a just recognition for his beautiful delivery of the 'cello solo in the Massenet suite.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are announced for a series of two song recitals on the afternoons of February 21 and 23. These great artists will thus supply the last link which is necessary to complete the chain of a great musical season.

The Philadelphia Press.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third Evening of the Seventeenth Season—Schumann's Fourth Symphony Rendered.

Just why Mr. Paur has abandoned last year's plan of an intermission during the rendition of the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not plain. There ought to be an intermission. There is plenty of time to take things leisurely and a chance to think over one portion of the programme before the other is forced upon you is not to be sneezed at. One is so accustomed to the intermission at the opera that the concerts seem unnecessarily hurried. Mr. Paur may, perhaps, have had a private tip that the majority of his audience preferred to hear and run. But he should consider the others and not bring about musical confusion, and, as it is not well to take one's musical relaxations too seriously it is to be hoped the intermission will be forthcoming the next time.

The programme of last evening had its contrasts in Tschaikowsky's "1812" overture, minus the cannon, and Massenet's "Furies," minus the furies. The Massenet music, as sweet and cloying as honey from a [illegible] honeycomb, is of the kind that can be [illegible] as effectively in smaller hall and by smaller orchestra but since its 'cello solo, in the third movement, gives Schroeder a chance to sing on the strings with his inimitable tone, it makes a very popular number, particularly when one takes into account the range of taste represented in the few thousands who are patrons of the concerts. The "1812" is also popular for very different reasons, as it is a typical concert finale and gives the orchestra a chance to work itself up in a fine phrensy.

Neither Massenet nor Tschaikowsky, however, dominated the memory unduly, as Schumann's fine symphony in D minor was the opening number, and it completely overshadowed all the other musical episodes of the evening, as its balance of romantiscism and intellectual vigor had all the picturesqueness and tone color attempted by either the French or the Russian composer. It is in such a composition that the admirable work of all the choirs, subordinated or dominating, is delightfully apparent and never more so than last night in the romanze and final movement. The soloist of the evening was Madame Lillian Blauvelt, whose concert work easily ranks among the best we hear. Brilliancy and agility were shown in the "Mireille" aria and daintiness and grace in the "Figaro" (Mozart) number, both brilliancy and daintiness being of a style peculiar to the singer and most pleasing, if not unusually striking.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Dvorak's symphony will be the principal number of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Music Hall next Wednesday evening. This work is marked by superb orchestration, and it is remarkably free from the dry and hard passages too prevalent in so-called classical music.

Other numbers on the programme are the Beethoven overture to "Lenore" No. 3, and the suite by Massenet, entitled "Les Erinnyes," the Furies, based on Laconte de Lisle's antique drama of that name.

The popular soprano singer, Madame Lillian Blauvelt, will be the soloist and will sing the aria "Voi Che Sapate" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and a beautiful aria from Gounod's opera of "Mirella."

MONDAY, JANUARY 24, [illegible]

SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Can you, Mr. Editor, who seem able to find the right answer to any question on any subject, tell ever so many of us who want to know, what the long-suffering musical public of Boston has done that it should be afflicted with three consecutive Symphony programmes having the only soloist (or soloists) each time a violinist?

There are many persons fond of music, more than that, musicians themselves, who are not overfond of the violin (at least any violin playing less than by an Ysaye or Marteau), and yet who paid last September good round sums for season seats on the strength of the prospectus, including, if I am not mistaken, among other names, that of Pugno, the great French pianist, now in this country. So far as I can learn, neither Pugno, Ysaye nor Marteau, all now in America, are to be heard in our Symphony course this season. Why is this thus? Unless Mr. Paur does not wish to displease the Musical Courier by encouraging any foreign talent!

When we shall have home talent equal to Ysaye's gift, that will "be another story," to quote Kipling; till then we should be allowed to hear (and thus learn and progress) such "stars" as the above mentioned.

If the reason is a financial one, if these "stars" are too expensive, and, like true stars, come high, then the wind is out of my sails, and I will simply be grateful to that generous man, Mr. Higginson, for what music we are able to have.

But if we must have three (four?) local solo violinists, cannot Mr. Paur divide the dose, and not make us take it in a lump? Besides, is it good programme-making?

KAY

Jan. 21.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1898.

MR. SEIDL GOING TO HAMBURG?

He Is Still Cogitating Over the Tempting Offer to Direct the Stadt Theatre.

"This, my dear sir, is not a question of money, but of art!" Thus Herr Seidl yesterday.

No one had supposed that it was.

But the master had spoken (which he rarely does), and the small group of "uebermenschen" that is ever near Herr Seidl rejoiced and ordered yet another cup of coffee. They had heard of the offer that had come from Hamburg which was detailed in yesterday's HERALD, and were anxious to know his decision.

Still the master brooded. He smoked and smoked and smoked, but not another word did he utter after the pregnant Leitmotif of art and money.

He thought of all sorts of things—of Herr Pierson in all probability, who but a few years since was an obscure secretary in the Berlin Opera House; of the beauties of the Hamburg Jungfernstieg, of the delicious aroma of the German ten pfennig "Virginia," of the splendors and the refined gayeties of the Hamburg Tivoli.

"Ostwaerts schweift sein Blick" whispered one Seidl courtier to the other, paraphrasing a Wagnerian line, which, translated into English, means "eastward roams his glance."

All this juncture the master cleared his throat, and for all the world it sounded as if he had said "Nit." To all who heard the ejaculation it really seemed as if Hamburg had lost and New York had won. Unfortunately the hearers were mistaken, for after ruminating another couple of hours the master elaborated his leading theme by saying:—

THE MASTER SPEAKS.

"Herr Pierson's offer tempts and flatters me; it really does, for the position of conductor in Hamburg is both an honorable and a profitable one. On the other hand, I know so little of the condition of affairs as they exist in Hamburg at the present day that I cannot make up my mind one way or another. I wrote Herr Pierson a lengthy letter only a few hours since, thanking him for his kind offer, which I have neither accepted nor declined. "If, in addition to the opera, it can be arranged that I conduct the Philharmonic concerts there, the invitation would be nearly irresistible, for you know that my life is in my concert work.

"No, not the Sunday night concerts here; I really must draw the line somewhere. When I was in Berlin last summer Herr Wolff made me a splendid offer to conduct concerts all winter in the leading cities of Germany, and to tell the truth I half regret not staying there, if only for a single season. In this city the time is out of joint.

NEW YORK DEGENERATING.

"The appreciation for what is best in music seems to be growing beautifully less year after year. Nor is it possible to give good music as it should be given. I have been working hard for nearly a dozen years now trying to get together a permanent orchestra, such as Chicago has given Mr. Thomas and Boston puts at the disposal of Herr Paur.

"These organizations, being subsidized, can rehearse a programme as often as they please before performing it in public. Hence the results, which are indisputably finer and more artistic than those of our local orchestras, which rehearse once or twice at the best.

SEIDL IS TIRED OF IT.

"I'm very tired of it all, for such a state of affairs makes you feel at times as if you were a mechanic, not an artist. So that if I do go to Hamburg it is not a question of money, you see, but of art, pure and simple. Fourteen of the best years of my life have been devoted to raising the standard of music in this city. But of true artistic atmosphere there is none, and I am no longer as sanguine as I was some years ago.

"Of course, it was understood between Mr. Grau and myself that I would conduct the Wagnerian works at the Opera House next season. I have not, however, entered into any contract with him. At least six weeks will elapse before anything definite will be done in the Hamburg matter.

"I must know exactly how the land lies before I pledge myself to Director Pierson; must know what works I shall be expected to conduct at the opera and the number of concerts he can guarantee me. No, I am quite ignorant of the salary that attaches to the position in Hamburg. Didn't I set out by saying most emphatically that this is a question of art, not money?"

With the Leitmotif, very richly orchestrated this time, Herr Seidl concluded the interview.

It's odds on, however, that Herr Seidl will occupy the conductor's stand when Jean de Reszke appears for the first time here as Siegmund in "Goetterdaemmerung."

[illegible] art and money are not as violently [illegible] to one another as Mr. Seidl seems to [illegible] or did think yesterday afternoon at [illegible] when he was not only out of sorts,

---

The Philadelphia concerts by our Symphony Orchestra are given in the Academy of Music, seating three thousand, and as a striking indication of the orchestra's remarkable success the management has inserted as a permanent part of the advertisement in the Philadelphia papers several days before each concert, the line "Every reserve seat sold." The orchestra plays tonight in Philadelphia; tomorrow afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore; in Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Thursday evening; in Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Sunday Jan. 9/98

The January concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra come next week, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The afternoon concert will have as soloists Mme. Szumowska, one of the best pianists who play here, and Evan Williams, a good tenor. In the evening Mme. Gadski, the admirable soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, will sing two arias. The programmes are both good, but that in the afternoon is made up from the lighter and more popular side of classical music. This coincides with a change in the management of the concerts which is heartily to be commended. The gallery at the Academy will seat 400 persons, and it is as empty as a tomb at the afternoon concerts. The management has decided to sell 400 rush tickets to this part of the house at 25 cents each. Each holder of a twenty-five cent ticket will thus be assured of a seat, but it will be first come first served in the selection of seats. The doors will open at 2 o'clock and ticket holders on hand promptly will have a chance at the front rows. The sale of these seats will begin at 9 o'clock on Monday morning at the office of the institute and at Chandler's, and not more than four tickets will be sold to any applicant. This is a long step toward popularizing the best music and is an offer of a liberal education in music at terms so low that any student can take advantage of it. The system has long been in vogue in Boston and is very popular there. We shall see this week whether there is as large a public that wants good music at cheap prices as has been talked about. But even if these cheap seats do not go with a rush at first the scheme ought not to be abandoned without a thorough trial. It is bound to make a public, even if it doesn't find one ready made, at it ought to do. The programmes for next week are as follows:

FRIDAY, 3 P. M.

Symphony No. 46, in D major (without minuet), ... Mozart
Nocturne in C minor .... Chopin
Impromptu in F sharp major .... Chopin
"La Campanella" .... Paganini-Liszt
Mme. Szumowska.
"Midsummer Night's Dream" music .... Mendelssohn
Prize song from "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner
H. Evan Williams.
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

SATURDAY, 8:15 P. M.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3 .... Beethoven
Aria from "Fidelio" .... Beethoven
Mme. Gadski.
Suite, "Les Erinnyes" (first time) .... Massenet
"Elsa's Dream" (balcony scene from Act 2, "Lohengrin") .... Wagner
Mme. Gadski.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4 .... Schumann

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 18, 1898.

MUSIC HALL.........Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | BLAUVELT

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19.

PROGRAMME.

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET.........Suite, "Les Erinnyes"

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's.

F.R.COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C.A.ELLIS, Mgr.

THE SUN

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 19.

Music Hall..................Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, } BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19 at 8.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."

MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."

BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.

GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."

MASSENET..............Suite, "Les Erinnyes."

First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Baltimore Life

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

GEORGE V. HOBART, Editor.

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 15TH, 1898.

MUSIC HALL.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will present an attractive programme for the third concert, to be given at Music Hall Wednesday evening, January 19. It opens with Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," written in 1893, direct after Mr. Dvorak's arrival in this country. It is especially interesting because of the effort on the part of a foreign composer to write what he considers American national music, and the composer shows a touch of his Bohemian nature by taking the themes of this symphony largely from the negro melodies from the Southern plantations. While its superb orchestration marks it as a classic, it is remarkably free from the dry and hard passages too prevalent in the so-called classical music. The second orchestra number on the programme is the Beethoven overture to "Leonore" No. 3, which has long beeen regarded as the king of overtures. The several dates of composition are given as follows: The overture No. 1 and overture No. 2, both composed in 1805; the overture No. 3, composed in 1806, and overture No. 4, composed in 1814. The first three are usually assigned to the opera of "Leonore," and the fourth to the opera of "Fidelio."" The closing orchestral number will be a suite by Massenet, "Les Erinnyes" ("The Furies)." "Les Erinnyes" is an antique drama in two parts by Leconte de Lisle, and was given with incidental music by Jules Massenet at the Odeon, in Paris, on January 6, 1873. Massenet's music, as given at the first performance of the play at the Odeon, was for strings only, with a few trombone passages in the prelude. He afterward rewrote and rescored the whole, adding some choruses and the long ballet divertissement. The music was one of the corner-stones of Massenet's reputation in France. The added choruses are omitted in the published score for concert performance. The soloist will be the favorite soprano, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing the aria, "Voi Che Sapate," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for the second selection a beautiful aria from Gounod's opera "Mirella."

* * *

JEWISH COMMENT.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 14, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall, Wednesday evening, January 19, is a most attractive one. It opens with Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," written in the summer of 1893, directly after Mr. Dvorak's arrival in this country.

The second orchestral number on the programme is the Beethoven overture to "Leonore" No. 3, which has long been regarded as the king of overtures.

The closing orchestral number will be a suite by Massenet, "Les Erinnyes" (The Furies). "Les Erinnyes" is an antique drama in two parts by Leconte de Lisle.

The soloist will be the favorite soprano, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing the aria "Voi Che Sapate," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for the second selection a beautiful aria from Gounod's opera "Mirella."

News

Jan. 12, 1898

Boston Symphony Concert.

The next Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Music Hall, the evening of Wednesday, January 19, will have Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," as the principal number on the programme. Madame Lillian Blauvelt, the popular soprano, will be the soloist, and will sing the aria, "Voi Che Sapate," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and a selection from Gounod's opera of "Mirella."

THE [illegible]

SATURDAY [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Madame Lillian Blauvelt Will Be the Soloist.

Madame Lillian Blauvelt, who will be the soloist of the next Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, to be given at Music Hall on Wednesday evening, is one of the most popular soprano singers now before the public.

The programme for this mid-winter concert will embrace, in addition to the Beethoven overture to "Lenore," No. 3, and a suite by Massenet, "Les Erinnyes," ("The Furies"), both of which rank as compositions of the highest order, Dvorak's interesting symphony entitled "From the New World."

MUSIC HALL.........Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET.........Suite, "Les Erinnyes"

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's.

F.R.COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C.A.ELLIS, Mgr.

Baltimore American

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16, 1898.

Music Hall MT. ROYAL AVE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

THIRD CONCERT, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 19, AT 8.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore." No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET..........Suite, "Les Erinnyes."
First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, now so popular in Baltimore, are anticipating with much pleasure the concert to be given at Music Hall next Wednesday evening. This is due to the fact that the piece de resistance of the program will be Drorak's symphony, "From the New World," composed in the summer of 1893, immediately following Mr. Drorak's arrival in America. This attempt of a foreign artist to exemplify what he regarded as American national music has called forth the liveliest criticisms of any which have been passed upon a work of this character for several years. The story going the rounds of the musical press, attributed to a writer of negro songs, that the principal subject of the slow movement of this symphony is a melody which he sent to the composer through a writer for the New York press, has been exploded. Even Mr. Krebbiel, the well-known musical critic, admits that in the largo, scherzo and final movement there are melodies and rhythms which quaintly suggest the old plantation songs of the South, and then he adds very pertinently: "Whatever Drorak intended, the symphony is so beautiful, particularly in the largo, that it should become the favorite with American audiences."

The Boston Orchestra has been pre-eminently successful in its rendition of the works of Beethoven, the great maestro.

THE SUN

BALTIMORE, TUESDAY, JAN. 18, 1898.

Music Hall..................Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, } BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19 at 8.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."

MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."

BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.

GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."

MASSENET..............Suite, "Les Erinnyes."

First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

[72]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 24, 1898

SYMPHONY PROGRAMMES

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Can you, Mr. Editor, who seem able to find the right answer to any question on any subject, tell ever so many of us who want to know, what the long-suffering musical public of Boston has done that it should be afflicted with three consecutive Symphony programmes having the only soloist (or soloists) each time a violinist?

There are many persons fond of music, more than that, musicians themselves, who are not overfond of the violin (at least any violin playing less than by an Ysaye or Marteau), and yet who paid last September good round sums for season seats on the strength of the prospectus, including, if I am not mistaken, among other names, that of Pugno, the great French pianist, now in this country. So far as I can learn, neither Pugno, Ysaye nor Marteau, all now in America, are to be heard in our Symphony course this season. Why is this thus? Unless Mr. Paur does not wish to displease the Musical Courier by encouraging any foreign talent!

When we shall have home talent equal to Ysaye's gift, that will "be another story," to quote Kipling; till then we should be allowed to hear (and thus learn and progress) such "stars" as the above mentioned.

If the reason is a financial one, if these "stars" are too expensive, and, like true stars, come high, then the wind is out of my sails, and I will simply be grateful to that generous man, Mr. Higginson, for what music we are able to have.

But if we must have three (four?) local solo violinists, cannot Mr. Paur divide the dose, and not make us take it in a lump? Besides, is it good programme-making?

KAY

Jan. 21.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1898.

MR. SEIDL GOING TO HAMBURG?

He Is Still Cogitating Over the Tempting Offer to Direct the Stadt Theatre.

"This, my dear sir, is not a question of money, but of art!" Thus Herr Seidl yesterday.

No one had supposed that it was.

But the master had spoken (which he rarely does), and the small group of "uebermenschen" that is ever near Herr Seidl rejoiced and ordered yet another cup of coffee. They had heard of the offer that had come from Hamburg which was detailed in yesterday's HERALD, and were anxious to know his decision.

Still the master brooded. He smoked and smoked and smoked, but not another word did he utter after the pregnant Leitmotif of art and money.

He thought of all sorts of things—of Herr Pierson in all probability, who but a few years since was an obscure secretary in the Berlin Opera House; of the beauties of the Hamburg Jungfernstieg, of the delicious aroma of the German ten pfennig "Virginia," of the splendors and the refined gayeties of the Hamburg Tivoli.

"Ostwaerts schweift sein Blick" whispered one Seidl courtier to the other, paraphrasing a Wagnerian line, which, translated into English, means "eastward roams his glance."

All this juncture the master cleared his throat, and for all the world it sounded as if he had said "Nit." To all who heard the ejaculation it really seemed as if Hamburg had lost and New York had won. Unfortunately the hearers were mistaken, for after ruminating another couple of hours the master elaborated his leading theme by saying:—

THE MASTER SPEAKS.

"Herr Pierson's offer tempts and flatters me; it really does, for the position of conductor in Hamburg is both an honorable and a profitable one. On the other hand, I know so little of the condition of affairs as they exist in Hamburg at the present day that I cannot make up my mind one way or another. I wrote Herr Pierson a lengthy letter only a few hours since, thanking him for his kind offer, which I have neither accepted nor declined. "If, in addition to the opera, it can be arranged that I conduct the Philharmonic concerts there, the invitation would be nearly irresistible, for you know that my life is in my concert work.

"No, not the Sunday night concerts here; I really must draw the line somewhere. When I was in Berlin last summer Herr Wolff made me a splendid offer to conduct concerts all winter in the leading cities of Germany, and to tell the truth I half regret not staying there, if only for a single season. In this city the time is out of joint.

NEW YORK DEGENERATING.

"The appreciation for what is best in music seems to be growing beautifully less year after year. Nor is it possible to give good music as it should be given. I have been working hard for nearly a dozen years now trying to get together a permanent orchestra, such as Chicago has given Mr. Thomas and Boston puts at the disposal of Herr Paur.

"These organizations, being subsidized, can rehearse a programme as often as they please before performing it in public. Hence the results, which are indisputably finer and more artistic than those of our local orchestras, which rehearse once or twice at the best.

SEIDL IS TIRED OF IT.

"I'm very tired of it all, for such a state of affairs makes you feel at times as if you were a mechanic, not an artist. So that if I do go to Hamburg it is not a question of money, you see, but of art, pure and simple. Fourteen of the best years of my life have been devoted to raising the standard of music in this city. But of true artistic atmosphere there is none, and I am no longer as sanguine as I was some years ago.

"Of course, it was understood between Mr. Grau and myself that I would conduct the Wagnerian works at the Opera House next season. I have not, however, entered into any contract with him. At least six weeks will elapse before anything definite will be done in the Hamburg matter.

"I must know exactly how the land lies before I pledge myself to Director Pierson; must know what works I shall be expected to conduct at the opera and the number of concerts he can guarantee me. No, I am quite ignorant of the salary that attaches to the position in Hamburg. Didn't I set out by saying most emphatically that this is a question of art, not money?"

With the Leitmotif, very richly orchestrated this time, Herr Seidl concluded the interview.

It's odds on, however, that Herr Seidl will occupy the conductor's stand when Jean de Reszke appears for the first time here as Siegmund in "Goetterdaemmerung."

For art and money are not as violently opposed to one another as Mr. Seidl seems to think, or did think yesterday afternoon at least, when he was not only out of sorts, but as depressed as if he had already lived half a dozen years or so on the banks of the Alster.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 17, 1898

The Philadelphia concerts by our Symphony Orchestra are given in the Academy of Music, seating three thousand, and as a striking indication of the orchestra's remarkable success the management has inserted as a permanent part of the advertisement in the Philadelphia papers several days before each concert, the line "Every reserve seat sold." The orchestra plays tonight in Philadelphia; tomorrow afternoon in Washington, Wednesday night in Baltimore; in Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Thursday evening; in Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Sunday Jan. 9/98

The January concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra come next week, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The afternoon concert will have as soloists Mme. Szumowska, one of the best pianists who play here, and Evan Williams, a good tenor. In the evening Mme. Gadski, the admirable soprano of the Damrosch Opera Company, will sing two arias. The programmes are both good, but that in the afternoon is made up from the lighter and more popular side of classical music. This coincides with a change in the management of the concerts which is heartily to be commended. The gallery at the Academy will seat 400 persons, and it is as empty as a tomb at the afternoon concerts. The management has decided to sell 400 rush tickets to this part of the house at 25 cents each. Each holder of a twenty-five cent ticket will thus be assured of a seat, but it will be first come first served in the selection of seats. The doors will open at 2 o'clock and ticket holders on hand promptly will have a chance at the front rows. The sale of these seats will begin at 9 o'clock on Monday morning at the office of the institute and at Chandler's, and not more than four tickets will be sold to any applicant. This is a long step toward popularizing the best music and is an offer of a liberal education in music at terms so low that any student can take advantage of it. The system has long been in vogue in Boston and is very popular there. We shall see this week whether there is as large a public that wants good music at cheap prices as has been talked about. But even if these cheap seats do not go with a rush at first the scheme ought not to be abandoned without a thorough trial. It is bound to make a public, even if it doesn't find one ready made, at it ought to do. The programmes for next week are as follows:

FRIDAY, 3 P. M.

Symphony No. 46, in D major (without minuet), ...Mozart
Nocturne in C minor ....Chopin
Impromptu in F sharp major...........Chopin
"La Campanella" ....Paganini-Liszt
Mme. Szumowska.
"Midsummer Night's Dream" music.Mendelssohn
Prize song from "Die Meistersinger"......Wagner
H. Evan Williams.
Overture to "Tannhauser" ....Wagner

SATURDAY, 8:15 P. M.

Overture, "Leonore," No. 3 ....Beethoven
Aria from "Fidelio" ....Beethoven
Mme. Gadski.
Suite, "Les Erinnyes" (first time) ......Massenet
"Elsa's Dream" (balcony scene from Act 2. "Lohengrin") ....Wagner
Mme. Gadski.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4 ....Schumann

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 18, 1898.

MUSIC HALL.........Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA | BLAUVELT

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19.

PROGRAMME.

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET.........Suite, "Les Erinnyes"

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's.

F.R.COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C.A.ELLIS, Mgr.

THE SUN

BALTIMORE, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 19.

Music Hall.................Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA, } BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19 at 8.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."

MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."

BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.

GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."

MASSENET..............Suite, "Les Erinnyes."

First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Baltimore Life

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY.

GEORGE V. HOBART, Editor.

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 15TH, 1898.

MUSIC HALL.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will present an attractive programme for the third concert, to be given at Music Hall Wednesday evening, January 19. It opens with Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," written in 1893, direct after Mr. Dvorak's arrival in this country. It is especially interesting because of the effort on the part of a foreign composer to write what he considers American national music, and the composer shows a touch of his Bohemian nature by taking the themes of this symphony largely from the negro melodies from the Southern plantations. While its superb orchestration marks it as a classic, it is remarkably free from the dry and hard passages too prevalent in the so-called classical music. The second orchestra number on the programme is the Beethoven overture to "Leonore" No. 3, which has long beeen regarded as the king of overtures. The several dates of composition are [illegible] as follows: The overture No. 1 and overture No. 2, both composed in 1805; the overture No. 3, composed [illegible] and overture No. 4, composed in 1814. The first three are [illegible] assigned to the opera of "Leonore," and the fourth to the opera of "Fidelio." The closing orchestral number will be a suite by Massenet "Les Erinnyes" (The Furies)." "Les Erinnyes" is an antique drama in two parts by Leconte de Lisle, and was given with incidental music by Jules Massenet at the Odeon, in Paris, on January [illegible]. Massenet's music, as given at the first performance of the play at the Odeon, was for strings only, with a few [illegible] in the prelude. He afterward rewrote and rescored the whole, adding some choruses and the long ballet [illegible]. The music was one of the corner stones of Massenet's reputation in France. The added choruses are omitted in the published score for concert performance. The soloist will be the favorite soprano, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing the aria, "Voi Che Sapate," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for the second selection a beautiful aria from Gounod's opera "Mirella."

JEWISH COMMENT.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 14, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall, Wednesday evening, January 10, is a most attractive one. It opens with Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," written in the summer of 1893, directly after Mr. Dvorak's arrival in this country.

The second orchestral number on the programme is the Beethoven overture to "Leonore" No. 3, which has long been regarded as the king of overtures.

The closing orchestral number will be a suite by Massenet, "Les Erinnyes" (The Furies). "Les Erinnyes" is an antique drama in two parts by Leconte de Lisle.

The soloist will be the favorite soprano, Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing the aria "Voi Che Sapate," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for the second selection a beautiful aria from Gounod's opera "Mirella."

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

SATURDAY EVENING, JAN. 15, 189

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Madame Lillian Blauvelt Will Be the Soloist.

Madame Lillian Blauvelt, who will be the soloist of the next Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, to be given at Music Hall on Wednesday evening, is one of the most popular soprano singers now before the public.

The programme for this mid-winter concert will embrace, in addition to the Beethoven overture to "Lenore," No. 3, and a suite by Massenet, "Les Erinnyes," ("The Furies"), both of which rank as compositions of the highest order, Dvorak's interesting symphony entitled "From the New World."

MUSIC HALL.........Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA | BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET.........Suite, "Les Erinnyes"

Tickets Now on Sale at Albert's.

F.R.COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C.A.ELLIS, Mgr.

Baltimore American

AND COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16, 1898.

Music Hall — MT. ROYAL AVE.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

THIRD CONCERT, WEDNESDAY, JAN. 19, AT 8.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore." No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET.............Suite, "Les Erinnyes."
First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, now so popular in Baltimore, are anticipating with much pleasure the concert to be given at Music Hall next Wednesday evening. This is due to the fact that the piece de resistance of the program will be Drorak's symphony, "From the New World," composed in the summer of 1893, immediately following Mr. Drorak's arrival in America. This attempt of a foreign artist to exemplify what he regarded as American national music has called forth the liveliest criticisms of any which have been passed upon a work of this character for several years. The story going the rounds of the musical press, attributed to a writer of negro songs, that the principal subject of the slow movement of this symphony is a melody which he sent to the composer through a writer for the New York press, has been exploded. Even Mr. Krebbiel, the well-known musical critic, admits that in the largo, scherzo and final movement there are melodies and rhythms which quaintly suggest the old plantation songs of the South, and then he adds very pertinently: "Whatever Drorak intended, the symphony is so beautiful, particularly in the largo, that it should become the favorite with American audiences."

The Boston Orchestra has been pre-eminently successful in its rendition of the works of Beethoven, the great maestro.

THE SUN

BALTIMORE, TUESDAY, JAN. 18, 1898.

Music Hall.................Mt. Royal Ave.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA, } BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19 at 8.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."

MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."

BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.

GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."

MASSENET.............Suite, "Les Erinnyes,"

First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

[72]

Sunday.
Jan. 16/98

IT IS ORCHESTRAL WEEK.

TWO CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND SOLOISTS.

Many Minor Musicales Will Also Be Given—Songs by a Brooklyn Composer. Preparations for Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"—Interest in Joseffy's Coming Appearance.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY—Concert of the Arion, with soloists; Arion Hall, 8 P. M. Metropolitan popular concert; Metropolitan Opera House, 8:15.

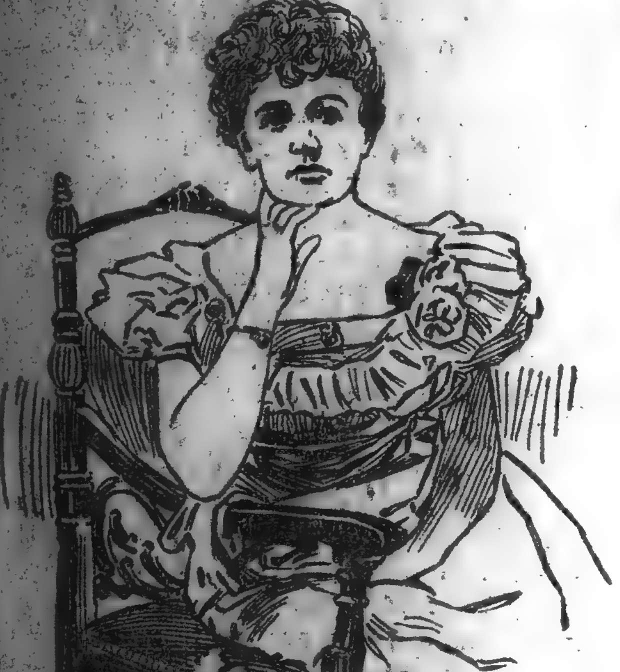
TUESDAY—Song recital by Mrs. J. Williams Macy; Memorial Hall, 3 P. M. Concert of songs by Louis Kommenich and cantata; Wissner Hall, 8:15 P. M.

THURSDAY—Concert for the Lutheran Zion Church, by Carl Fique; Association Hall, 8:15 P. M.

FRIDAY—Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra; Academy of Music, 3 P. M.

SATURDAY—Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra; Academy of Music, 8:15 P. M.

This is Boston Symphony week, and no other music offered in Brooklyn quite equals in value the two concerts which this superb orchestra gives each month. It is a matter of regret from an educational standpoint that the Friday afternoon concerts have not drawn larger audiences. Now that the gallery is to be thrown open for 25 cents admission, however, there is no reason why any earnest music student or teacher should not become familiar with the best music through this orchestra, and it is to be hoped that the audiences on Friday afternoons will be as large as on Saturday evenings. The soloists this week are of unusual interest and merit. On Friday afternoon Mme. Szumowska, Paderewski's pupil and one of the most interesting pianists who come here, will play a group of the Chopin things in which she and her teacher are at their best, and H. Evan Williams, an admirable tenor, will sing. The Saturday night soloists will be Mme. Gadski, one of the leading sopranos with Damrosch's opera company and an artist whose work is always a delight. The afternoon programme is light and graceful and more solid fare is provided for Saturday, when the programme will close with Schumann's Fourth Symphony. The full list follows:



MME. SZUMOWSKA.

FRIDAY, 3 P. M.

Symphony No. 46, in D major (without minuet) .... Mozart
Nocturne in C minor .... Chopin
Impromptu in F sharp major .... Chopin
"La Campanella" .... Paganini-Liszt
Mme. Szumowska.
"Midsummer Night's Dream" music .. Mendelssohn
Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" ... Wagner
H. Evan Williams.
Overture to "Tannhauser" .... Wagner

SATURDAY, 8:15 P. M.

Overture "Leonore," No. 3 .... Beethoven
Aria from "Fidelio" .... Beethoven
Mme. Gadski.
Suite, "Les Erinnyes" (first time) ..... Massenet
"Elsa's Dream" (balcony scene from Act II, "Lohengrin") .... Wagner
Mme. Gadski.
Symphony in D minor, No. 4 .... Schumann

As befits symphony week there will be no other concerts of the first rank in the borough this week, but there are a number of minor affairs which have much local musical interest. For to-night the Arion Society, under Arthur Claassen, will give its second concert of the season at Arion Hall, with the assistance of Marie Rappold, soprano; Elsa Von Moltke, violin; Wilhelm Xanten, tenor; Hugo Troetschel, organ, and Otto L. Fischer, piano. The chorus will sing a number of brief modern compositions, and an arrangement of "My Old Kentucky Home," made by Arthur Claassen, for solo quartet and mixed chorus.

Louis Kommenich, director of the Saengerbund, is not only an excellent conductor, but a prolific and graceful composer and on Tuesday evening he will give his friends a chance to hear a long list of his songs. The concert will be given at Wissner Hall and Mr. Kommenich will have for interpreters an admirable quartet, Hildegard Hoffman, soprano; Josephine S. Jacoby, contralto; William Bartels, tenor; Henry Bartels, baritone; a double male quartet and a woman's chorus, with Alexander Rihm at the piano. The second part of the programme will be devoted to a cantata, "The Blind Fairy," by Max Meyer-Olbersleben, and the first to Mr. Kommenich's songs, as follows:

"Lebenswanderung."
"Mein Liebgesell."
Double quartet.
"Ach! Koennt' ich das vergessen" (Ah, could I but forget thee.)
"Ich sag' es nicht" (I'll not tell.)
Miss Hildegard Hoffmann.
"Rosenzeit," MS.
"Herbstwanderung" (Love's Vassal.)
Mr. William Bartels.
"Heimliches Klingen" (Mysterious Melody.)
"Wenn ich's nur wuesst' " (If I but knew.)
Mrs. Josephine S. Jacoby.
"Der Troubadour" (The Troubadour.)
"Der Einzigen," MS.
"Vagantenlied" (Vagrant's Song.)
Mr. Henry Bartels.
[illegible]
"Maedchen[illegible]" (Maiden's Joy.)
Miss Hildegard Hoffmann.
"Sehnsucht" (Longing.)
Ladies' Chorus.
"Wer weiss?" (Who knows.)
Mrs. Josephine S. Jacoby.
"Abschied" (Parting.)
"Lockung" (Love's Pleading.)
Double quartet.

Mrs. J. Williams Macy, a pupil of Albert Gerard Thiers, will introduce herself on Tuesday afternoon by a song recital at Memorial Hall. She will have the assistance of William Barber, pianist, and Mr. Thiers as accompanist. Her programme includes songs by Chaminade, Bemberg, Jensen, Clayton, Johns, E. Newcomb, J. C. Bartlett and Victor Harris.

The fifth annual concert for the benefit of the Aid Society of the Lutheran Zion Church will be given at Association Hall on Thursday evening. The concert is by Carl Fique, assisted by the Rheinfaelzer Maennerchor of New York, the mixed chorus choir of the church, Katharine Noack-Fique, mezzo-soprano and piano; Mrs. T. Treckman, contralto; Miss Jennie S. Liebmann, piano; Miss Eleanor Treadwell, piano, and E. A. Kent, tenor. The programme includes an Easter cantata, a Christmas carol and some male choruses by Mr. Fique, and standard piano compositions and songs.

The soloists at the concert at the Metropolitan to-night include Alice Verlet, soprano; Mrs. Jacoby, contralto; the Sutro sisters, ensemble pianists, and Leon Max, tenor. Seidl and his orchestra will furnish the backbone of the programme.

Damrosch opens his opera season at the Metropolitan this week with his most familiar operas: "Traviata," with Melba on Monday; "Tannhauser," on Wednesday; "Die Meistersinger" on Friday evening and "Faust" on Saturday afternoon.

The Institute is making a persistent attempt to revive the standard oratorios which were so popular a genration ago but are now seldom heard. Last year it gave a very good performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which has come nearer to keeping itself alive than any oratorio except "The Messiah." This year on February 2 it will follow up that lead with the same composer's "St. Paul." The performance will be under the direction of Walter Henry Hall, who conducted "Elijah," and the choruses will be sung by his admirable chorus, the Brooklyn Oratorio Club. The soloists will be Ida Gray Scott, a well known church soprano in Manhattan Borough; Josephine S. Jacoby, an alto, who is rising rapidly to the first rank; Dr. Ion Jackson, a tenor unknown here, and Dr. Carl E. Dufft, bass. This ought to insure an excellent performance and the revival ought to be successful. There is no such choral writing as is to be found in these oratorios which have fallen into neglect of late years, and the Brooklyn Institute affords just the audience to receive their revival sympathetically. No one who cares for music in its larger forms should miss "St. Paul" and this will afford the only opportunity which has been given to hear the work for years.

There is much interest among pianists in particular in the Seidl concert of February 5, on which night Joseffy will afford a most unusual treat by playing two concertos. One of these is Chopin's in E minor in which he recently made a sensation at one of the Astoria concerts, and the other is that by Liszt in A major. The American feature of the programme will be the overture to Dudley Buck's "Marmion."

Every Saturday Review

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 15, 1898.

MUSIC HALL. ...oyal Ave.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

3rd Concert WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19, at 3 P. M

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapere," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET.........Suite, "Les Erinnyes." First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

The third concert of the series to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at Music Hall, where conductor Emil Paur will offer a varied program well calculated to appeal to the tastes of the advocates of the different schools of music. Mme Blauvelt will be the soloist and will sing an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and recitative and aria "To cheat my love" from Gounod's opera, Mirella. The opening number of the evening and the chef d'ouvre of the concert is Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," which has been given but once before in Baltimore when Seidl's orchestra gave it for the first time shortly after it was written in 1893 The symphony is characteristic of American life and strongly appeals to those in whom the love of country is instilled. Blending with the voices of nature are heard the wail of the Indian, the triumphal sound at the birth of liberty and the progress of civilization. Dvorak has treated his subject in a masterly way and has given a classic environment to common place subjects which is the acme of poetic treatment. The other orchestral numbers are Beethoven's Overture "to Leonore" No. 3; and Massenet's Suite, "Les Erinnyes" which is given for the first time here. Tickets are now on sale at Albert's.

[illegible]
Jan, 9 / 1898

8

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Items of Interest to the Local Lyric World.

NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dvoraks, From the New World, to Be the Principal Number of the Programme — Baltimore Composer's Works to Be Produced in New York Next Month—Other Matters Musical.

The programme for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall, Wednesday evening, January 19, is a most attractive one. It open with Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," written in the summer of 1893 directly after Mr. Dvorak's arrival in this country.

It is exceedingly interesting because of the effort on the part of a foreign composer to write what he considers American national music, and the composer shows a touch of his Bohemian nature by taking the themes of this symphony largely from the negro melodies from the Southern plantations. While its superb orchestration marks it as a classic, it is remarkably free from the dry and hard passages too prevalent in the so-called classical music.

The statement with regard to this symphony that it is based largely on negro melodies for its themes has aroused considerable discussion among the critics. One writer, in commenting upon a recent performance of this symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, quotes Mr. Krenbiel as follows:

"We are aware that a writer of negro songs is going about the country with the assertion that the principal subject of the slow movement of this symphony is a melody which he sent to the composer through a newspaper reporter. But we do not consider the story worth believing for a moment." The critic then adds: "Even Mr. Krehbiel will perhaps admit that in the largo, scherzo and final movement there are melodies and rhythms which quaintly suggest plantations songs," and then adds very pertinently that "whatever Dvorak intended, the symphony is so beautiful, particularly the largo, that it should become the favorite with American audiences."

The second orchestral number on the programme is the Beethoven overture to "Leonore" No. 3, which has long been regarded as the king of overtures. There has always been a good deal of controversy as to Beethoven's four overtures to "Leonore." The several dates of composition are given as follows: The overture No. 1 and overture No. 2, both composed in 1805; the overture No. 3, composed in 1806, and overture No. 4, composed in 1814. The first three are usually assigned to the opera of "Leonore," and the fourth to the opera of "Fidelio." Just why Beethoven wrote so many overtures to this opera is easily explained on the ground of his not being satisfied with his earlier compositions. Beethoven's tendency to make such changes in his themes as he worked them over and over again to get them to satisfy him is universally known, as it is also abundantly proved in his sketch books.

The closing orchestral number will be a suite by Massenet, "Les Erinnyes" (The Furies). "Les Erinnyes" is an antique drama in two parts by Laconte de Lisle, and was given with incidental music by Jules Massenet at the Odeon, in Paris, on January 6, 1873. Massenet's music, as given at the first performance of the play at the Odeon, was for strings only, with a few trombone passages in the prelude. He afterward rewrote and rescored the whole, adding some choruses and the long ballet divertissement. The music was one of the cornerstones of Massenet's reputation in France. The added choruses are omitted in the published score for concert performance.

The soloist will be the favorite soprano Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing the aria "Voi Che Sapate," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for the second selection a beautiful aria from Gounod's opera "Mirella."

THE SUNDAY HERALD.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16.

MUSIC HALL. MT. ROYAL AVENUE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | BLAUVELT

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19, at 3.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET..........Suite, "Les Erinnyes." First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

* * *

Only once has Anton Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," been heard in Baltimore, and this occurred several seasons ago.

While the composition was appreciated and admired at the time, one presentation of a writing so new and foreign to works of a heavy nature afforded little if any, opportunity for critical study. It is therefore pleasing to musical Baltimore to know that the novel Dvorak work is to be heard again in Baltimore, and additionally satisfactory to know that "From the New World" will be interpreted by Director Emil Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next concert by this splendid organization will be given in the Music Hall next Wednesday evening, when the Dvorak Symphony will be the principal number on the programme. This work has been widely criticised, both in Europe and America, but every rendition of it has but added to its popularity with audiences on this side of the Atlantic; and, indeed, the critics, while of much diversity of opinion regarding the sources of Dvorak's inspiration, are a unit in proclaiming the great beauty and the wonderful harmonies of the work.

In addition to this masterpiece of Dvorak, next Wednesday night's programme will include Beethoven's great work, the overture to "Lenore No. 3" and Massenet's suite "Les Erinnyes" (Furies). A greater variety of symphonic treatment of varying musical themes could scarcely be grouped in a single concert programme than is to be found in this midwinter performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The length of the orchestral numbers will make the enforcement of the 8.15 rule more imperatively necessary at this concert than usual, and holders of tickets are therefore urged to be prompt in their attendance.

The close attention necessary to the enjoyment of the playing of the orchestra will be delightfully relieved at intervals between the orchestral numbers by the rendition of two beautiful arias by the favorite soprano singer, Madame Lillian Blauvelt. She will sing "Voi Che Sapote" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and a selection from "Mirella," one of Gounod's operas, which is rarely produced at the present time.

* * *

[73]

Sunday
Jan. 16/98

IT IS ORCHESTRAL WEEK.

TWO CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY AND SOLOISTS.

Many Minor Musicales Will Also Be Given—Songs by a Brooklyn Composer. Preparations for Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"—Interest in Joseffy's Coming Appearance.

CALENDAR FOR THE WEEK.

SUNDAY—Concert of the Arion, with soloists; Arion Hall, 8 P. M. Metropolitan popular concert; Metropolitan Opera House, 8:15.

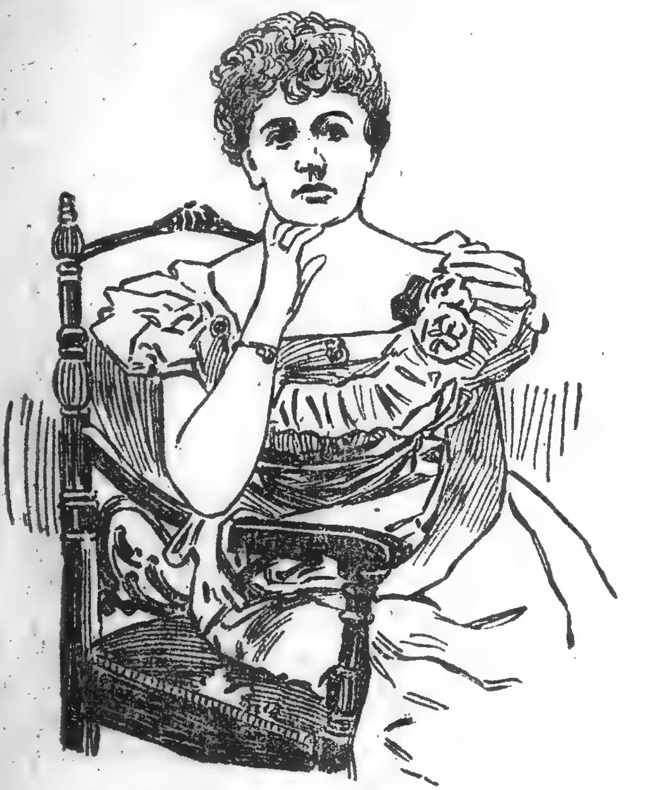
TUESDAY—Song recital by Mrs. J. Williams Macy; Memorial Hall, 3 P. M. Concert of songs by Louis Kommenich and cantata; Wissner Hall, 8:15 P. M.

THURSDAY—Concert for the Lutheran Zion Church, by Carl Fique; Association Hall, 8:15 P. M.

FRIDAY—Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra; Academy of Music, 3 P. M.

SATURDAY—Concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra; Academy of Music, 8:15 P. M.

This is Boston Symphony week, and no other music offered in Brooklyn quite equals in value the two concerts which this superb orchestra gives each month. It is a matter of regret from an educational standpoint that the Friday afternoon concerts have not drawn larger audiences. Now that the gallery is to be thrown open for 25 cents admission, however, there is no reason why any earnest music student or teacher should not become familiar with the best music through this orchestra, and it is to be hoped that the audiences on Friday afternoons will be as large as on Saturday evenings. The soloists this week are of unusual interest and merit. On Friday afternoon Mme. Szumowska, Paderewski's pupil and one of the most interesting pianists who come here, will play a group of the Chopin things in which she and her teacher are at their best, and H. Evan Williams, an admirable tenor, will sing. The Saturday night soloists will be Mme. Gadski, one of the leading sopranos with Damrosch's opera company and an artist whose work is always a delight. The afternoon programme is light and graceful and more solid fare is provided for Saturday, when the programme will close with Schumann's Fourth Symphony. The full list follows:



MME. SZUMOWSKA.

FRIDAY, 3 P. M.

Symphony No. 46, in D major (without minuet) ....Mozart
Nocturne in C minor ....Chopin
Impromptu in F sharp major ....Chopin
"La Campanella" ....Paganini-Liszt

Mme. Szumowska.

"Midsummer Night's Dream" music..Mendelssohn
Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger"....Wagner

H. Evan Williams.

Overture to "Tannhauser"............Wagner

SATURDAY, 8:15 P. M.

Overture "Leonore," No. 3............Beethoven
Aria from "Fidelio"............Beethoven

Mme. Gadski.

Suite, "Les Erinnyes" (first time)......Massenet
"Elsa's Dream" (balcony scene from Act II, "Lohengrin")............Wagner

Mme. Gadski.

Symphony in D minor, No. 4............Schumann

As befits symphony week there will be no other concerts of the first rank in the borough this week, but there are a number of minor affairs which have much local musical interest. For to-night the Arion Society, under Arthur Claassen, will give its second concert of the season at Arion Hall, with the assistance of Marie Rappold, soprano; Elsa Von Moltke, violin; Wilhelm Xanten, tenor; Hugo Troetschel, organ, and Otto L. Fischer, piano. The chorus will sing a number of brief modern compositions, and an arrangement of "My Old Kentucky Home," made by Arthur Claassen, for solo quartet and mixed chorus.

Louis Kommenich, director of the Saengerbund, is not only an excellent conductor, but a prolific and graceful composer and on Tuesday evening he will give his friends a chance to hear a long list of his songs. The concert will be given at Wissner Hall and Mr. Kommenich will have for interpreters an admirable quartet, Hildegard Hoffman, soprano; Josephine S. Jacoby, contralto; William Bartels, tenor; Henry Bartels, baritone; a double male quartet and a woman's chorus, with Alexander Rihm at the piano. The second part of the programme will be devoted to a cantata, "The Blind Fairy," by Max Meyer-Olbersleben, and the first to Mr. Kommenich's songs, as follows:

"Lebenswanderung."
"Mein Liebgesell."

Double quartet.

"Ach! Koennt' ich das vergessen" (Ah, could I but forget thee.)
"Ich sag' es nicht" (I'll not tell.)

Miss Hildegard Hoffmann.

"Rosenzeit," MS.
"Herbstwanderung" (Love's Vassal.)

Mr. William Bartels.

"Heimliches Klingen" (Mysterious Melody.)
"Wenn ich's nur wuesst'" (If I but knew.)

Mrs. Josephine S. Jacoby.

"Der Troubadour" (The Troubadour.)
"Der Einzigen," MS.
"Vagantenlied" (Vagrant's Song.)

Mr. Henry Bartels.

"Das Maedchen und der Dornbusch" (The Maiden and the Briar.)
"Maedchenglueck" (Maiden's Joy.)

Miss Hildegard Hoffmann.

"Sehnsucht" (Longing.)

Ladies' Chorus.

"Wer weiss?" (Who knows.)

Mrs. Josephine S. Jacoby.

"Abschied" (Parting.)
"Lockung" (Love's Pleading.)

Double quartet.

Mrs. J. Williams Macy, a pupil of Albert Gerard Thiers, will introduce herself on Tuesday afternoon by a song recital at Memorial Hall. She will have the assistance of William Barber, pianist, and Mr. Thiers as accompanist. Her programme includes songs by Chaminade, Bemberg, Jensen, Clayton, Johns, E. Newcomb, J. C. Bartlett and Victor Harris.

The fifth annual concert for the benefit of the Aid Society of the Lutheran Zion Church will be given at Association Hall on Thursday evening. The concert is by Carl Fique, assisted by the Rheinfaelzer Maennerchor of New York, the mixed chorus choir of the church, Katharine Noack-Fique, mezzo-soprano and piano; Mrs. T. Treckman, contralto; Miss Jennie S. Liebmann, piano; Miss Eleanor Treadwell, piano, and E. A. Kent, tenor. The programme includes an Easter cantata, a Christmas carol and some male choruses by Mr. Fique. and standard piano compositions and songs.

The soloists at the concert at the Metropolitan to-night include Alice Verlet, soprano; Mrs. Jacoby, contralto; the Sutro sisters, ensemble pianists, and Leon Max, tenor. Seidl and his orchestra will furnish the backbone of the programme.

Damrosch opens his opera season at the Metropolitan this week with his most familiar operas: "Traviata," with Melba on Monday; "Tannhauser," on Wednesday; "Die Meistersinger" on Friday evening and "Faust" on Saturday afternoon.

The Institute is making a persistent attempt to revive the standard oratorios which were so popular a genration ago but are now seldom heard. Last year it gave a very good performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which has come nearer to keeping itself alive than any oratorio except "The Messiah." This year on February 2 it will follow up that lead with the same composer's "St. Paul." The performance will be under the direction of Walter Henry Hall, who conducted "Elijah," and the choruses will be sung by his admirable chorus, the Brooklyn Oratorio Club. The soloists will be Ida Gray Scott, a well known church soprano in Manhattan Borough; Josephine S. Jacoby, an alto, who is rising rapidly to the first rank; Dr. Ion Jackson, a tenor unknown here, and Dr. Carl E. Dufft, bass. This ought to insure an excellent performance and the revival ought to be successful. There is no such choral writing as is to be found in these oratorios which have fallen into neglect of late years. and the Brooklyn Institute affords just the audience to receive their revival sympathetically. No one who cares for music in its larger forms should miss "St. Paul" and this will afford the only opportunity which has been given to hear the work for years.

There is much interest among pianists in particular in the Seidl concert of February 5, on which night Joseffy will afford a most unusual treat by playing two concertos. One of these is Chopin's in E minor in which he recently made a sensation at one of the Astoria concerts, and the other is that by Liszt in A major. The American feature of the programme will be the overture to Dudley Buck's "Marmion."

Every Saturday Review

BALTIMORE, JANUARY 15, 1898.

MUSIC HALL. [illegible] yal Ave.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. | BLAUVELT.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

3rd Concert WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19, at 3 P. M

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapere," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET..........Suite, "Les Erinnyes."

First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert

The third concert of the series to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place next Wednesday night at Music Hall, where conductor Emil Paur will offer a varied program well calculated to appeal to the tastes of the advocates of the different schools of music. Mme Blauvelt will be the soloist and will sing an aria from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and recitative and aria "To cheat my love" from Gounod's opera, Mirella. The opening number of the evening and the chef d'ouvre of the concert is Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," which has been given but once before in Baltimore when Seidl's orchestra gave it for the first time shortly after it was written in 1893 The symphony is characteristic of American life and strongly appeals to those in whom the love of country is instilled. Blending with the voices of nature are heard the wail of the Indian, the triumphal sound at the birth of liberty and the progress of civilization. Dvorak has treated his subject in a masterly way and has given a classic environment to common place subjects which is the acme of poetic treatment. The other orchestral numbers are Beethoven's Overture "to Leonore" No. 3; and Massenet's Suite "Les Erinnyes" which is given for the first time here. Tickets are now on sale at Albert's.

Sunday
Herald
Jan. 16/1898

IN HARMONY'S REALM

Items of Interest to the Local Lyric World.

NEXT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Dvoraks, From the New World, to Be the Principal Number of the Programme — Baltimore Composer's Works to Be Produced in New York Next Month—Other Matters Musical.

The programme for the third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Hall, Wednesday evening, January 19, is a most attractive one. It opens with Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," written in the summer of 1893 directly after Mr. Dvorak's arrival in this country.

It is exceedingly interesting because of the effort on the part of a foreign composer to write what he considers American national music, and the composer shows a touch of his Bohemian nature by taking the themes of this symphony largely from the negro melodies from the Southern plantations. While its superb orchestration marks it as a classic, it is remarkably free from the dry and hard passages too prevalent in the so-called classical music.

The statement with regard to this symphony that it is based largely on negro melodies for its themes has aroused considerable discussion among the critics. One writer, in commenting upon a recent performance of this symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, quotes Mr. Krenbiel as follows:

"We are aware that a writer of negro songs is going about the country with the assertion that the principal subject of the slow movement of this symphony is a melody which he sent to the composer through a newspaper reporter. But we do not consider the story worth believing for a moment." The critic then adds: "Even Mr. Krehbiel will perhaps admit that in the largo, scherzo and final movement there are melodies and rhythms which quaintly suggest plantations songs," and then adds very pertinently that "whatever Dvorak intended, the symphony is so beautiful, particularly the largo, that it should become the favorite with American audiences."

The second orchestral number on the programme is the Beethoven overture to "Leonore" No. 3, which has long been regarded as the king of overtures. There has always been a good deal of controversy as to Beethoven's four overtures to "Leonore." The several dates of composition are given as follows: The overture No. 1 and overture No. 2, both composed in 1805; the overture No. 3, composed in 1806, and overture No. 4, composed in 1814. The first three are usually assigned to the opera of "Leonore," and the fourth to the opera of "Fidelio." Just why Beethoven wrote so many overtures to this opera is easily explained on the ground of his not being satisfied with his earlier compositions. Beethoven's tendency to make such changes in his themes as he worked them over and over again to get them to satisfy him is universally known, as it is also abundantly proved in his sketch books.

The closing orchestral number will be a suite by Massenet, "Les Erinnyes" (The Furies). "Les Erinnyes" is an antique drama in two parts by Laconte de Lisle, and was given with incidental music by Jules Massenet at the Odeon, in Paris, on January 6, 1873 Massenet's music, as given at the first performance of the play at the Odeon, was for strings only, with a few trombone passages in the prelude. He afterward rewrote and rescored the whole, adding some choruses and the long ballet divertissement. The music was one of the cornerstones of Massenet's reputation in France. The added choruses are omitted in the published score for concert performance.

The soloist will be the favorite soprano Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, who will sing the aria "Voi Che Sapate," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and for the second selection a beautiful aria from Gounod's opera "Mirella."

THE SUNDAY HERALD.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 16.

MUSIC HALL. MT. ROYAL AVENUE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA | BLAUVELT

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Third Concert, WEDNESDAY, Jan. 19, at 8.

PROGRAMME:

DVORAK—Symphony "From the New World."
MOZART—Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro."
BEETHOVEN—"Overture to Leonore," No. 3.
GOUNOD—Recitative and Aria, "To Cheat My Love," from the opera "Mirella."
MASSENET...........Suite, "Les Erinnyes."

First Time.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

* * *

Only once has Anton Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," been heard in Baltimore, and this occurred several seasons ago.

While the composition was appreciated and admired at the time, one presentation of a writing so new and foreign to works of a heavy nature afforded little if any, opportunity for critical study. It is therefore pleasing to musical Baltimore to know that the novel Dvorak work is to be heard again in Baltimore, and additionally satisfactory to know that "From the New World" will be interpreted by Director Emil Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The next concert by this splendid organization will be given in the Music Hall next Wednesday evening, when the Dvorak Symphony will be the principal number on the programme. This work has been widely criticised, both in Europe and America, but every rendition of it has but added to its popularity with audiences on this side of the Atlantic; and, indeed, the critics, while of much diversity of opinion regarding the sources of Dvorak's inspiration, are a unit in proclaiming the great beauty and the wonderful harmonies of the work.

In addition to this masterpiece of Dvorak, next Wednesday night's programme will include Beethoven's great work, the overture to "Lenore No. 3" and Massenet's suite "Les Erinnyes" (Furies). A greater variety of symphonic treatment of varying musical themes could scarcely be grouped in a single concert programme than is to be found in this midwinter performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The length of the orchestral numbers will make the enforcement of the 8.15 rule more imperatively necessary at this concert than usual, and holders of tickets are therefore urged to be prompt in their attendance.

The close attention necessary to the enjoyment of the playing of the orchestra will be delightfully relieved at intervals between the orchestral numbers by the rendition of two beautiful arias by the favorite soprano singer, Madame Lillian Blauvelt. She will sing "Voi Che Sapote" from "The Marriage of Figaro" and a selection from "Mirella," one of Gounod's operas, which is rarely produced at the present time.

* * *

[73]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House. The musical scheme was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture, op. 80.............Brahms
Scena and Aria, Ah! Perfidio, op. 65...........Beethoven
Suite, Les Erinnyes..........................Massenet
  Entr'acte.
  Grecian Dance.
  Scene Religieuse
  Finale.
(First time.)
Elizabeth's Greeting, from Tannhäuser...........Wagner
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, from the New World, op. 95..........................Dvorák
Soloist, Mme. Lillian Nordica.

Such a performance of Dvorák's fine, satisfying work we have seldom heard; not that we agree with Mr. Paur in the matter of tempi, but the technical excellence and envisagement of the composer's moods we have not often had the pleasure of recording. The Brahms overture was read with lusty precision, and the Massenet suite—which the writer of these lines heard at its initial Parisian performance—was played with brilliancy and clarity of outline that was captivating. In the "Scene Religeuse" Alwin Schroeder gave, with a melting cantabile, the E minor solo—a solo Massenet has used with effect as a vocal "Elegie." But Mr. Schroeder could not be imposed upon by hearty applause, and set a good example for ambitious orchestral soloists.

Nordica sang the numbers allotted her on the program.

BROOKLYN OFFICE THE MUSICAL COURIER,
539 FULTON STREET, January 24, 1898.

THERE has been so much music this week that I feel as though my pen, instead of tracing words, was writing symphonies and concertos. Again the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come and gone, but this time it has left an imprint that will not soon be forgotten.

This was the first afternoon concert given under the régime of opening the Amphitheatre to music students and school children at twenty-five cents. The question did arise while the matter was being agitated as to whether the school children actually would take enough interest in orchestral music to attend. This question was settled beyond a doubt when crowds upon crowds with eager faces and their school books and music rolls under their arms thronged into the concert. Boys and girls ranging from thirteen years up were there and the order kept was something ideal.

Madame Berta Grosse Thomason, who had from ten to fifteen pupils among them, told me that she deserted her seat in the parquet to go up to see for herself how the young people received the magnificent program, and she said that the enthusiasm was something remarkable, and their enjoyment was fairly ecstasy. The management regretted extremely that it was forced to refuse seats to a very large number, as it did not feel justified in selling these seats at the door, knowing that there were none to be secured after they had been admitted.

The rest of the house was crowded and a renewed enthusiasm was prevalent which must indeed have been sweet music to the ears of Mr. Paur and his orchestra. The magnificent program was given superbly, but the crown of everything was the overture to "Tannhäuser," which was a masterly presentation. Mr. Paur is a good Wagnerian conductor, and more of these selections would be welcome from him indeed.

The soloists, Mme. Szumowska and Evan Williams, were received with much enthusiasm, each one receiving five or six recalls.

Evan Williams was superb in Walther's "Preislied," only I wish he had sung it in German instead of in English. The evening performance was equally enjoyable. The orchestra gave the delightful Massenet number which was given in New York, and is probably reviewed in those columns. The Schumann Symphony was magnificent, as also the "Leonore" overture. What an all-encompassing musician Paur is, and how responsive his orchestra is to his desire. The next concerts occur February 18 and 19.

The Nordica row is a foolishly told story. Here are the facts: Dear old Snorts, as we call her, was in high spirits when she reached the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday morning. There were no seats for the Boston Band, and so, hatted and standing, the two vocal numbers were given. Kneisel, of the Butter Fiddle, conducted and Nordica was really pleased. But when she first saw the men standing—never an unpleasant spectacle even for such an artist—she exclaimed:

"It's a regular Kalamazoo orchestra." The third tympanist and ninth contrafagottist—both men without any personal sense of humor—grew indignant and by 7:15 that evening a series of resolutions was drafted, in which it was distinctly specified that any member of old man Higginson's band from Boston who applauded Lillian Balloon Doeme at the concert would be fined. I caught Charlie Ellis clapping his fins together, and, after telling Melb what I thought of him, I made him go out and buy the beer.

He did. So did I.

STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN,
JANUARY 22, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An exceptionally fine programme was offered yesterday afternoon at the third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whether it was due to the programme or a general awakening on the part of the Brooklyn people to the fact that the Boston Orchestra is the finest in the world, the Academy of Music held an audience twice as large as that which was present at the opening of the series of matinees in November. The "Boston plan" of selling seats in the family circle for 25 cents was tried for the first time with excellent results. Many young students and pupils from the different schools took advantage of the reduced price. Mr. Paur and his men were in the best of form. The familiar face of Franz Kneisel, the concert master, was missed, but he will undoubtedly be in his place tonight. The soloists, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, the pianiste, and Evan Williams, the tenor, were both delightful. Mme. Szumowska is distinguished for three things. First, as an artist of great talents; second, as the only pupil of Paderewski, and third, as the wife of Mr. Adamowski, one of the solo violinists of the orchestra and the leader of the Adamowski string quartet.

While a pupil of the great Polish pianist, Mme. Szumowska's playing is marked by her own charming individuality. She resembles her master in but two things—modesty and the harplike touch in drawing music from the keys. What she lacks in virility she makes up in delicacy and grace. Her trilling sounded like the tickling of some exquisite silver bell, and her runs were as smooth and beautiful as if sent out from the throat of some forest bird. Her selections were the Chopin nocturne in C minor, the Chopin Impromptu in F sharp major, and brilliant Paganina-Liszt, "La Campanella." The audience recalled her several times, and members of the orchestra joined heartily in the demonstration. Mr. Williams sang "Walter's Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger." Wagner must have written that song for just such a singer as Mr. Williams. His voice is very beautiful, and to that he adds a fine method, and best of all, the passion and varied expression required for such music. It should not be difficult for a Welshman to learn German, especially in these days of "rapid methods." If Mr. Williams could be induced to undertake the study of the language necessary for Wagner music, he would would make a grand acquisition to the German opera forces, for he has the physique, voice and dramatc ability all combined. Yesterday he sang the "Prize Song" in English, and that is never quite satisfactory to the thorough student, but his beautiful voice and sympathetic manner atoned for this one defect. He, too, was recalled half a dozen times. The orchestra played Mozart's Symphony No. 46, in D major. (This is one of three symphonies composed by Mozart, without the minuet), the overture, Sherzo, nocturne and wedding march, from Mendelsshon's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser." The Mendelssohn and Wagner numbers are frequently heard, but it was a great treat to hear them again from such an orchestra. It took a little time to become accustomed to Mr. Paur as a conductor, and now it is but just to state that he has completely stamped himself as a leader and musician, of the most thorough and scholarly attainments. Mr. Higginson, the patron and friend of the orchestra, made no mistake when he re-engaged Mr. Paur as the conductor for another term of years.

Mme. Johanna Gadski, of the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, will be the soloist at to-night's concert. She will sing an aria from "Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," and "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin." The orchestra will play "Beethoven's "Leonore," overture No. 3; "Les Erinnyes," a new suite, by Massenet, and Schumann's D minor symphony. It's a grand programme, and should be heard by a crowded house.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND. 27

PAUR WILL STAY.

Colonel Higginson Denies the Reported Symphony Change.

Musical people in Boston were not a little stirred up by the apparently well authenticated story that at the end of the present season Emil Paur would lay down his baton as leader of the Boston Symphony, and his place would be taken by Felix Weingartner, conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

This story, which is emphatically denied by Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the founder and head of the Boston Symphony, appeared in the Musical Courier, and asserted beyond a doubt that Mr. Weingartner was at the present time considering the offer and doing his best to get his release from the Berlin theatre.

"It is a lie," said Colonel Higginson to the Post reporter last night, "a lie from beginning to end, and I will thank you to say so."

This is Mr. Paur's fifth season, and the story was readily credited, as his 10-year contract contains a clause by which his services may be dispensed with at this time by the payment to him of a $10,000 bonus.

Colonel Higginson was asked with regard to the contract, but declined to discuss this matter, saying that this was a matter that he would talk over with nobody.

Other rumors are now in circulation, one to the effect that Richter of the Imperial Opera in Vienna, and another coupling Walter Damrosch's name with the conductorship of the Boston Symphony, but neither of them finds wide credence, it being thought by those who ought to know best that Mr. Paur, whose work the present season has met with high praise by the critics in this and other cities, will stay. It is claimed that as the best of feeling and harmony now prevail between the leader and the orchestra, whose work is highly creditable, a change of leadership could do no good but possibly much harm.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, MASS., JAN. 23, 1898.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert at the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, last Thursday evening, with Mme. Nordica as the soloist, and concerts in the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mme. Gadski was the soloist last night.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The thirteenth of the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Miss Olive Mead was the soloist.

The programme consisted of Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture, Saint-Saens's concerto for violin and orchestra, No. 3, in B minor, Op. 61, Chabrier's prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline," and Sgambati's Symphony in D, No. 1, Op. 16.

Miss Olive Mead made a most favorable impression by her performance of the Saint-Saens concerto. She has improved wonderfully in recent years, and is now able to take an enviable position with our many eminent violinists. The concerto is one of the most interesting works of its class written for some time, if not the most serious. It has been heard here once or twice before in these concerts. Miss Mead had an enthusiastic reception and there were several recalls. At the next rehearsal and concert Mr. Alexander Siloti, the eminent pianist, will make his first appearance in this city, as the soloist, in Tschaikowsky's concerto No. 2. The other numbers will be by the same composer, also, and are the "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and the overture, "1812."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred last Thursday night in the Metropolitan Opera House. The musical scheme was as follows:

Academic Festival Overture, op. 80..............Brahms
Scena and Aria, Ah! Perfidio, op. 65...........Beethoven
Suite, Les Erinnyes...........................Massenet
  Entr'acte.
  Grecian Dance.
  Scene Religieuse
  Finale.
(First time.)
E[illegible] Greeting, from Tannhäuser...........Wagner
S[illegible] 5, in E minor, from the New [illegible] 95..............................Dvorák
Soloist, Mme. Lillian Nordica.

Su[illegible] performance of Dvorák's fine, satisfying work w[illegible] heard; not that we agree with Mr. Paur in [illegible] of tempi, but the technical excellence and [illegible] the composer's moods we have not often [illegible] of recording. The Brahms overture w[illegible] lusty precision, and the Massenet suite—which [illegible] of these lines heard at its initial Parisian per[illegible] was played with brilliancy and clarity of outline [illegible] was captivating. In the "Scene Religeuse" Alwin Schroeder gave, with a melting cantabile, the E minor [illegible] solo Massenet has used with effect as a vocal "Elegie." But Mr. Schroeder could not be imposed upon by hearty applause, and set a good example for ambitious orchestral soloists.

Nordica sang the numbers allotted her on the program.

BROOKLYN OFFICE THE MUSICAL COURIER,
539 FULTON STREET, January 24, 1898.

THERE has been so much music this week that I feel as though my pen, instead of tracing words, was writing symphonies and concertos. Again the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come and gone, but this time it has left an imprint that will not soon be forgotten.

This was the first afternoon concert given under the régime of opening the Amphitheatre to music students and school children at twenty-five çents. The question did arise while the matter was being agitated as to whether the school children actually would take enough interest in orchestral music to attend. This question was settled beyond a doubt when crowds upon crowds with eager faces and their school books and music rolls under their arms thronged into the concert. Boys and girls ranging from thirteen years up were there and the order kept was something ideal.

Madame Berta Grosse Thomason, who had from ten to fifteen pupils among them, told me that she deserted her seat in the parquet to go up to see for herself how the young people received the magnificent program, and she said that the enthusiasm was something remarkable, and their enjoyment was fairly ecstasy. The management regretted extremely that it was forced to refuse seats to a very large number, as it did not feel justified in selling these seats at the door, knowing that there were none to be secured after they had been admitted.

The rest of the house was crowded and a renewed enthusiasm was prevalent which must indeed have been sweet music to the ears of Mr. Paur and his orchestra. The magnificent program was given superbly, but the crown of everything was the overture to "Tannhäuser," which was a masterly presentation. Mr. Paur is a good Wagnerian conductor, and more of these selections would be welcome from him indeed.

The soloists, Mme. Szumowska and Evan Williams, were received with much enthusiasm, each one receiving five or six recalls.

Evan Williams was superb in Walther's "Preislied," only I wish he had sung it in German instead of in English. The evening performance was equally enjoyable. The orchestra gave the delightful Massenet number which was given in New York, and is probably reviewed in those columns. The Schumann Symphony was magnificent, as also the "Leonore" overture. What an all-encompassing musician Paur is, and how responsive his orchestra is to his desire. The next concerts occur February 18 and [illegible]

The Nordica row is a foolishly told story. Here are the facts: Dear old Snorts, as we call her, was in high spirits when she reached the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday morning. There were no seats for the Boston Band, and so, hatted and standing, the two vocal numbers were given. Kneisel, of the Butter Fiddle, conducted and Nordica was really pleased. But when she first saw the men standing—never an unpleasant spectacle even for such an artist—she exclaimed:

"It's a regular Kalamazoo orchestra." The third tympanist and ninth contrafagottist—both men without any personal sense of humor—grew indignant and by 7:15 that evening a series of resolutions was drafted, in which it was distinctly specified that any member of old man Higginson's band from Boston who applauded Lillian Balloon Doeme at the concert would be fined. I caught Charlie Ellis clapping his fins together, and, after telling Melb what I thought of him, I made him go out and buy the beer.

He did. So did I.

STANDARD UNION
BROOKLYN
JANUARY 22, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An exceptionally fine programme was offered yesterday afternoon at the third matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whether it was due to the programme or a general awakening on the part of the Brooklyn people to the fact that the Boston Orchestra is the finest in the world, the Academy of Music held an audience twice as large as that which was present at the opening of the series of matinees in November. The "Boston plan" of selling seats in the family circle for 25 cents was tried for the first time with excellent results. Many young students and pupils from the different schools took advantage of the reduced price. Mr. Paur and his men were in the best of form. The familiar face of Franz Kneisel, the concert master, was missed, but he will undoubtedly be in his place to-night. The soloists, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska, the pianiste, and Evan Williams, the tenor, were both delightful. Mme. Szumowska is distinguished for three things. First, as an artist of great talents; second, as the only pupil of Paderewski, and third, as the wife of Mr. Adamowski, one of the solo violinists of the orchestra and the leader of the Adamowski string quartet.

While a pupil of the great Polish pianist, Mme. Szumowska's playing is marked by her own charming individuality. She resembles her master in but two things—modesty and the harplike touch in drawing music from the keys. What she lacks in virility she makes up in delicacy and grace. Her trilling sounded like the tickling of some exquisite silver bell, and her runs were as smooth and beautiful as if sent out from the throat of some forest bird. Her selections were the Chopin nocturne in C minor, the Chopin Impromptu in F sharp major, and brilliant Paganina-Liszt, "La Campanella." The audience recalled her several times, and members of the orchestra joined heartily in the demonstration. Mr. Williams sang "Walter's Prize Song," from "Die Meistersinger." Wagner must have written that song for just such a singer as Mr. Williams. His voice is very beautiful, and to that he adds a fine method, and best of all, the passion and varied expression required for such music. It should not be difficult for a Welshman to learn German, especially in these days of "rapid methods." If Mr. Williams could be induced to undertake the study of the language necessary for Wagner music, he would would make a grand acquisition to the German opera forces, for he has the physique, voice and dramatc ability all combined. Yesterday he sang the "Prize Song" in English, and that is never quite satisfactory to the thorough student, but his beautiful voice and sympathetic manner atoned for this one defect. He, too, was recalled half a dozen times. The orchestra played Mozart's Symphony No. 46, in D major. (This is one of three symphonies composed by Mozart, without the minuet), the overture, Sherzo, nocturne and wedding march, from Mendelsshon's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser." The Mendelssohn and Wagner numbers are frequently heard, but it was a great treat to hear them again from such an orchestra. It took a little time to become accustomed to Mr. Paur as a conductor, and now it is but just to state that he has completely stamped himself as a leader and musician, of the most thorough and scholarly attainments. Mr. Higginson, the patron and friend of the orchestra, made no mistake when he re-engaged Mr. Paur as the conductor for another term of years.

Mme. Johanna Gadski, of the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, will be the soloist at to-night's concert. She will sing an aria from "Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," and "Elsa's Dream," from "Lohengrin." The orchestra will play "Beethoven's "Leonore," overture No. 3; "Les Erinnyes," a new suite, by Massenet, and Schumann's D minor symphony. It's a grand programme, and should be heard by a crowded house.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
Jan 29

PAUR WILL STAY.

Colonel Higginson Denies the Reported Symphony Change.

Musical people in Boston were not a little stirred up by the apparently well authenticated story that at the end of the present season Emil Paur would lay down his baton as leader of the Boston Symphony, and his place would be taken by Felix Weingartner, conductor of the Royal Opera House in Berlin.

This story, which is emphatically denied by Colonel Henry L. Higginson, the founder and head of the Boston Symphony, appeared in the Musical Courier, and asserted beyond a doubt that Mr. Weingartner was at the present time considering the offer and doing his best to get his release from the Berlin theatre.

"It is a lie," said Colonel Higginson to the Post reporter last night, "a lie from beginning to end, and I will thank you to say so."

This is Mr. Paur's fifth season, and the story was readily credited, as his 10-year contract contains a clause by which his services may be dispensed with at this time by the payment to him of a $10,000 bonus.

Colonel Higginson was asked with regard to the contract, but declined to discuss this matter, saying that this was a matter that he would talk over with nobody.

Other rumors are now in circulation, one to the effect that Richter of the Imperial Opera in Vienna, and another coupling Walter Damrosch's name with the conductorship of the Boston Symphony, but neither of them finds wide credence, it being thought by those who ought to know best that Mr. Paur, whose work the present season has met with high praise by the critics in this and other cities, will stay. It is claimed that as the best of feeling and harmony now prevail between the leader and the orchestra, whose work is highly creditable, a change of leadership could do no good but possibly much harm.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, MASS., JAN. 23, 1898.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave a concert at the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, last Thursday evening, with Mme. Nordica as the soloist, and concerts in the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mme. Gadski was the soloist last night.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JAN. 30, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The thirteenth of the regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Miss Olive Mead was the soloist.

The programme consisted of Meyerbeer's "Struensee" overture, Saint-Saens's concerto for violin and orchestra, No. 3, in B minor, Op. 61, Chabrier's prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline," and Sgambati's Symphony in D, No. 1, Op. 16.

Miss Olive Mead made a most favorable impression by her performance of the Saint-Saens concerto. She has improved wonderfully in recent years, and is now able to take an enviable position with our many eminent violinists. The concerto is one of the most interesting works of its class written for some time, if not the most serious. It has been heard here once or twice before in these concerts. Miss Mead had an enthusiastic reception and there were several recalls. At the next rehearsal and concert Mr. Alexander Siloti, the eminent pianist, will make his first appearance in this city, as the soloist, in Tschaikowsky's concerto No. 2. The other numbers will be by the same composer, also, and are the "Pathetic" Symphony No. 6 and the overture, "1812."

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 30.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 30, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Olive Mead Makes Her Debut as a Soloist.

The Varied Programme Presented with Brilliant Effect—Mr. Paur's Sympathetic Reading Brings Out the Fine Points of Some of the Old Favorites.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was given before a very large audience, the selections being:

Overture, "Struensee"..............Meyerbeer
Concerto for violin, No. 1, op. 61..Saint-Saens
Prelude to act 3, "Gwendoline"......Chabrier
Symphony No. 1, op. 16.............Sgambati

The soloist was Miss Olive Mead.

It was an interesting programme, varied and brilliant in character, and admirably balanced. It is true that there was nothing new, although the Meyerbeer overture is so seldom played, and as the symphony had only one previous hearing here, they may be fairly viewed in the light of novelties.

Meyerbeer's overture, composed as a prelude to his brother's tragedy of the same name, was well worth the hearing again, though it has aged somewhat since it was last heard. When it originally appeared it was thought rather profound; so much so that it was proclaimed by one facetious critic that its title should be "Abstrusensee." The why and the wherefore of this is difficult to understand at this late date, for at present it seems to be, despite its flights into fugato, exceedingly simple, and what was once deemed its massive and complicated instrumentation has become rather thin and plain sailing in comparison with the orchestration of today. Still, it is yet an admirable overture, somewhat operatic in its general aspect, but strong and effective in its way, and the most ambitious and the only deserving example of Meyerbeer's more serious work for the orchestra alone. Its performance was admirable in color and perfect in execution.

The Chabrier entr'acte holds its own firmly, and gains in interest with each succeeding presentation. It was exquisitely read and played, the beautiful combinations for the wind instruments being given with especial delicacy of style and charm of effect.

If the Sgambati symphony is not a great work, it is, nevertheless, strong in individuality and in mastery of orchestral treatment, and may be safely pronounced the most important and the most successful work for the orchestra that the modern Italian school has produced. It is less vague and more free from the too-deliberate struggling for mere originality than are the more recent efforts of the composer. All that it has to say was brought out clearly, forcibly and satisfyingly by the intelligent and sympathetic reading accorded it by Mr. Paur.

Miss Olive Mead proved to be a young artist of fine musical instinct, and of really exceptional ability. She has a large and full tone, her intonation is without a flaw, her bowing is free and graceful, and her technique is remarkable in its easy fluency, its certainty and its finish. She plays in a style marked by elegance, breadth and distinction, with confidence and authority, and with thorough musicianly taste.

Her performance of the Saint-Saens concerto was very beautiful, indeed, in all that regards the technical essentials of her art and maturity of skill generally. From the beginning to the end of her efforts her playing was singularly interesting and attractive in its freedom from affectation and in its frank sincerity. The slow movement was given with delightful purity of taste and grace of phrasing, and in the more brilliant and exacting moments of the work she acquitted herself with unfailing exactness.

Miss Mead is decidedly an artist of whom much may be confidently expected when she has grown in experience and has gained something more of warmth, variety and passionateness in expression. The honor of so young an artist appearing at a Symphony concert was fully justified by the admirably guided talent that she manifested. She at once won the good will of her audience, which applauded her with exceptional enthusiasm after each movement, and vigorously recalled her four or five times at the end of the concerto. Her success was overwhelming. Miss Mead has studied under Mr. Kneisel, who may well take pride in his pupil.

The next programme is to be devoted to Tschaikowsky, of whose works the following are to be given: Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"; concerto for piano No. 2 (for the first time at these concerts); and the overture, "1812." The soloist will be Mr. Alexander Siloti.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 31, 1898.

Meyerbeer and Sgambati in the Symphony Concert.

Meyerbeer's Overture to "Struensee," with which the concert of Saturday began, was like a buoy set in a yacht race, for it served to show how far the modern orchestral craft had sailed. There was a time when this work was thought too complex, and its orchestration was considered something wonderfully fine; now it is regarded as a very simple affair,

"And none so poor to do it reverence."

Nevertheless it presented some dramatic points, and its chief theme was not an unattractive bit of melody. Its counterpoint was not in any degree awe-inspiring, and its occasional blatancy caused one to remember how the gentle Schumann became fiery when rebuking the footlight-flavor of Meyerbeer.

Spite of all the attacks, Meyerbeer has made some wonderful bits of scoring; his use of English horn in the grand duo of the "Huguencts," his grand drum crescendos in the Benediction of the Poignards, his employment of Bass Clarinette in the finale of the same opera, his kettle-drum melody in the second act of "Robert," his bassoon passages at the Rising of the Nuns, and a host of other instances, might be adduced to prove the man more of a genius than a charlatan.

The old monks abused the Roman Coliseum but used its stones to build their churches; the modern composers have treated Meyerbeer in very much the same fashion. The performance of the overture was brilliant and its dramatic character lost nothing in Mr. Paur's reading.

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist of the concert. She appeared in St. Saens violin concerto in B minor. The great violin concertos can be easily counted on the fingers of one hand, and this one is not of them. It is prolix, ornate after the manner of violin concertos, and makes a long story out of a very short message. Miss Olive Mead played it in a chaste and blameless manner.

Although comparisons are always a thankless task, one could not help remembering the mighty breadth of Isaye in his debut in this work, three years ago, and contrasting it with the suavity of the present performance; Achilles in petticoats was not more out of place than the passion of St. Saens clothed in a Chesterfieldian imperturbability. In short it was the right thing in the wrong place, the right artist in the wrong composition.

Judged purely as violin-playing Miss Mead's work becomes worthy of great commendation; the intonation was delightfully pure and there was a surety in her work that imparted a sense of confidence to the auditor. The passages in harmonics at the end of the second movement were given with remarkable purity, and the brilliant fioriture of the finale had not a suspicion of blur. As a consequence Miss Mead was recalled again and again, with great enthusiasm, by the large audience.

Chabrier's prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" came next; it is a strong contrast to the overture to the work, that being all tumult, kettledrum, and piccolo, while this is of Goldmarkian sensuousness. Probably this prelude pictures the nuptials of Gwendoline and Harold, and its gloomier touches, the melancholy of the English horn, the dark tones of the deepest wood-wind, presage the betrayal and massacre of the Danes.

It is a pretty story (Catulle Mendes, the writer of filth, produces a pure and noble picture in this libretto) and here the music seems closely wedded to the tale. Naturally it erquires the most perfect of shading, and the nuances of the orchestra deserve all praise.

Among the blind the one-eyed man is King; among the Italians Sgambati is regarded as a great symphonic composer. When this symphony was first performed in Vienna, a musical wit called it a great exhibition of Musical Cookery. The witticism holds; Italian themes are cooked in the German manner, and just as Richard Strauss (in his "In Italy") labelled his Hochheimer "Chianti," we find Sgambati calling his Chianti "Hochheimer," and he cooks his Italian thoughts with plenty of German sauce. Liszt is to blame for all this, and the fault stands out more clearly on a second hearing of the work.

There was no valid reason for a second hearing of the symphony, except perhaps the possession of the score and parts, and sufficient honor was done to the orchestral pioneer of a vocal nation, by the presentation of the work four years ago.

The national flavor is present in the symphony, perceptible even under its Teutonic disguise, in the employment of the old Roman ecclesiastical modes and in the folk-song character of the Serenade.

That a composer who betrays effort in his work (although the resultant movements are musicianly) and who has no very perceptible glow of thematic invention, should add an extra movement to the regular symphonic four, was certainly unwise. Yet the added movement is probably, together with the Scherzo, the most spontaneous part of the whole symphony.

The leading over from the Serenade into the Finale (for the two last movements are joined together a la Beethoven), is rather abrupt, and the sudden tumult of the finale is as unexpected as if an irate father had suddenly appeared at a window and violently broken up the serenade! Yet the finale gained somewhat on a second hearing; there is in it a proper brilliancy and a sufficiency of effective contrast.

The chief charge to be made against the composer is that he is not his natural self; he is continually striving to do something in the style of the masters whom Liszt caused him to worship, and the effect is apparent. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is more Italian than this work of the Roman composer.

Much may be expected from Sgambati when he becomes less learned and more natural. As it is, this symphony may be regarded as an epoch work in Italian musical history, and the world owes Sgambati thanks for the orchestral wedge which he has pushed into Italy. But we need not study his symphony any more in the Music Hall concerts.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 30, 1898.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert, Emil Paur, Conductor, in Music Hall Last Night—Miss Olive Mead Was the Solo Violinist.

The program of the 13th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Overture to "Struensee"...........Meyerbeer
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor, Op. 61..............................Saint-Saëns
Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline"....Chabrier
Symphony No. 1, in D major, Op.16..Sgambati

Mr. Apthrop's statement that the overture to "Struensee" is "indeed the only orchestral composition of Meyerbeer's that has held its place in the serious concert repertory" is too sweeping. As a matter of fact, the incidental music to "Struensee" has been given several times of late years in Paris at serious concerts, as at the Chatelet.

Surely there is no good reason for the frequent performance of this overture. It is laboriously made and of little or no effect. Meyerbeer's hands were supported, when he was strongest, by the stage carpenter and the scene painter, In his operas there are a few great moments and a singular wealth of ingenious detail. Many borrowed freely from him, and the most ungrateful of these borrowers was Wagner. When Meyerbeer was obliged to write orchestral music without the aid of the footlights, he cut a sorry figure. Take this overture, for instance; how cut and dried it is—without nobility or beauty or breadth of theme—without true skill in the development. How hopelessly old-fashioned and futile is the orchestration! Nowhere is there substantial thought. Nowhere is there any sustained flight of imagination, however near the ground.

⁂

Miss Mead is the third female violinist who has made her appearance at a Symphony concert in Music Hall.

The first was Mrs. Terese Liebe, who appeared with her brother Theodor Liebe, a 'cellist, and Mr. Henschel in Beethoven's concerto in C for piano, violin, and 'cello, Jan. 21, 1882. In the same concert she played with her brother an andante for violin and 'cello from Henschel's suite op. 23. It was at this concert that Mr. Henschel acted as conductor, composer and pianist.

Mrs. Camilla Urso was the next. She played, March 3, 1888, Rubinstein's concerto op. 46, and she appeared again in 1892.

Miss Mead has a smooth, fluent, well-developed technic. Her tone is full and pure, and she plays with ease and accuracy. She is a pupil of whom any teacher of technic might well be proud. But last night she displayed icy musical indifference. There was no warmth. There was no feeling; there was no suggestion of emotion. The uniform strength of her tone became monotonous. She did not essay, even in parrot fashion, dynamic gradations. In a word, her performance was icily regular and soulless.

The prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline" is beautiful music, and repetition does not stale it. Mr. Paur read it sympathetically, as he did the symphony that followed. This symphony is ingeniously put together and there are effective passages, but I find it, as a whole, carefully thought out and without genuine spontaneity. Sgambati could not free himself in this symphony from ecclesiastical association. You are reminded constantly of the plain-song of the church, which intrudes even in the Scherzo. I wish Sgambati had been content to stay on his own side of the Alps and had not been afraid of being called an Italian. Liszt has other sins to answer for than the creation of the Liszt pupil; and Sgambati's admiration for Liszt is an injury to the individuality of his art.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY, JAN 30, 1898.

Olive Mead, Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

When a soloist is recalled again and again by a symphony rehearsal audience—usually undemonstrative to a degree—while artists of Mr Paur's orchestra joined enthusiastically in the plaudits of the time, the fact is significant of a very decided success indeed. The young violinist, Miss Olive Mead, in whose career a goodly number of residents in greater Boston are interested, is entitled to warm congratulations over a triumph that was at once popular and artistic.

The playing of the young artist in Saint-Saens' concerto for violin, No. 3, which constituted her offering to the symphony program last week, is in truth entitled to warm praise. Miss Mead is in every sense of the term the mistress of her instrument. If now and again she failed to evoke quite the strength of tone which an Ysaye was able to present in this concerto, in delicacy of touch, richness of tone and finely delicate appreciation of the composer's thought, Miss Mead's performance left nothing to be desired. Add to this that the embellished passages of the concerto were executed with a skill and speed that were the more marvelous because of the lack of all apparent effort in her playing, and the "reason why" of her noteworthy success will readily be understood.

The name of Olive Mead is well assured of a high place in the ranks of the distinguished women violinists of our time.

Meyerbeer opened the program. Perhaps the excellence of the presentation of the "Struensee" overture was due in a measure, at least, to a desire on the orchestra's part to show that the works of composers of schools old as well as new will receive careful and appreciative treatment at the hands of Mr Paur's players.

The prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" found careful performance, and Sgambati's first symphony, which fairly tested, in its varied demands, the resources and skill of our famous orchestra, was played with much spirit and success. The symphony is rather lengthy as a wind-up for a concert, but there's no denying that it has many beauties well worth setting forth.

A Tschaikowsky program is announced for this week. The celebrated pianist, Mr Alexander Siloti, is to present the composer's second concerto for piano for the first hearing at the symphony concerts, and the "Pathetique" symphony with the overture "1812" will be included among the offerings.

BOSTON COURIER
JANUARY 30, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

The unusually long array of violin solos which has been previously presented at this season's Symphony concerts, received an addition in the naming upon the thirteenth programme of Saint-Saens's third concerto, to be played by Miss Olive Mead, who has been developing of late from an interesting child-player to an accomplished young artist. This composition, brilliant, fanciful and elegant, appeals alike to the virtuoso and the musician of deeper feeling, and can easily occupy the full attention and art of such artists as Sarasate, to whom it was dedicated, or of Ysaye, who first played it in Boston. That there are in it depths and heights which Miss Mead cannot yet sound and scale, goes withont saying, as also that it bespeaks at times the dash, the rush, the sweep and the ardent force which she does not show. Yet her performance possessed many essentials of high art. She was clear in comprehension and definite in expression; she was decisive, if not powerful, in the stronger passages, while for the others she had a smoothly sustained cantabile, an exact and easy execution and a pure, unblemished tone. Her trill was even, her roulades well proportioned and her harmonies liquid and true. Had warmth and energy been present in any marked degree, there would have been little to which reasonable criticism could except, for Miss Mead gave pleasure and gained approval by the simple, honest, effective goodness of her playing. The orchestral part was most considerately and agreeably delivered, particularly in the second and third movements, where so many comments are made upon the solo lines.

The overture was Meyerbeer's to the tragedy of "Struensee," a comparatively unfamiliar one to the concert-room. Its broad, serious, church-like introduction and its dramatic main body were well presented and made a decided impression.

The other numbers were acquaintances—the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Sgambak's first symphony, which reveals more and more of its spiritual depth, its emotional power, its original thought and its ability to express these, at every fresh hearing.

The next programme is all from Tschaikowsky and includes these numbers: The "Pathetic" symphony; the second pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Siloti to play it; and the "1812" overtnre.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE, BOSTON, JANUARY 29,

The Symphony Orchestra gave its thirteenth concert of the season last evening in Music Hall. The program was:

Overture, "Struensee,".............Meyerbeer
Concerto for Violin, No. 3, B minor, op. 61 ....Saint-Saens
Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline"..Chabrier
Symphony No. 1, D major, op. 16....Sgambati

The program was very pleasant throughout, and there was a graceful and uninterrupted curve of descent from the flippancies of the overture to the solidity of the symphony. The overture, of course, is a very delightful work, but it is too easily understood, perhaps, to suit modern taste. The Chabrier prelude is equally pleasant and more modern. It is what the program eloquently calls freiphantasierend, and in its dreamy meanderings, leading no whither, it arouses the state of perplexed doubt that is the foundation of art conviction. The Sgambati symphony wears well, especially in spots. It is an honest, solid work; at times brilliant and passionate, and there are discoverable and original ideas, as well as the rich fringes of learning. It was interpreted with fine vigor and with the most faultless taste by the orchestra.

The interest of the concert, however, centered in the soloist, Miss Olive Mead. This artist has steadily improved in her work, and has now reached the point of excellence where she may successfully challenge comparison with older violinists. She has taste, intelligence and skill, and she is the interpreter as well as the player. Her work at this concert was most satisfactory and most delightful. She reached to the very heart of her work, reading it like a true artist—her phrasing showing rare intelligence—and playing it with rare technical skill. It was a most finished, careful and thoughtful piece of work, played in a large, broad, fluent style and with unaffected sincerity. There were brilliancy, grace, solidity and feeling, and excuses on the plea of youth were not needed. The difficulties of the work were conquered by Miss Mead with graceful ease, but excellent as is her technique, large and free as is her bowing, she compels one to listen to her as artist, and full satisfaction is the result. Miss Mead deservedly won the admiration and enthusiasm of her audience, and if her progress in the future is as rapid as in the past she will soon stand in the very front rank of her art.

At the next concert there will be a Tschaikowsky program, including the Sixth Symphony, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, and the "1812" overture. The soloist will be Mr. Alexander Siloti.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 30.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 30, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Miss Olive Mead Makes Her Debut as a Soloist.

The Varied Programme Presented with Brilliant Effect—Mr. Paur's Sympathetic Reading Brings Out the Fine Points of Some of the Old Favorites.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was given before a very large audience, the selections being:

Overture, "Struensee"..................Meyerbeer
Concerto for violin, No. 1, op. 61..Saint-Saens
Prelude to act 3, "Gwendoline".......Chabrier
Symphony No. 1, op. 16...............Sgambati

The soloist was Miss Olive Mead.

It was an interesting programme, varied and brilliant in character, and admirably balanced. It is true that there was nothing new, although the Meyerbeer overture is so seldom played, and as the symphony had only one previous hearing here, they may be fairly viewed in the light of novelties.

Meyerbeer's overture, composed as a prelude to his brother's tragedy of the same name, was well worth the hearing again, though it has aged somewhat since it was last heard. When it originally appeared it was thought rather profound; so much so that it was proclaimed by one facetious critic that its title should be "Abstrusensee." The why and the wherefore of this is difficult to understand at this late date, for at present it seems to be, despite its flights into fugato, exceedingly simple, and what was once deemed its massive and complicated instrumentation has become rather thin and plain sailing in comparison with the orchestration of today. Still, it is yet an admirable overture, somewhat operatic in its general aspect, but strong and effective in its way, and the most ambitious and the only deserving example of Meyerbeer's more serious work for the orchestra alone. Its performance was admirable in color and perfect in execution.

The Chabrier entr'acte holds its own firmly, and gains in interest with each succeeding presentation. It was exquisitely read and played, the beautiful combinations for the wind instruments being given with especial delicacy of style and charm of effect.

If the Sgambati symphony is not a great work, it is, nevertheless, strong in individuality and in mastery of orchestral treatment, and may be safely pronounced the most important and the most successful work for the orchestra that the modern Italian school has produced. It is less vague and more free from the too-deliberate struggling for mere originality than are the more recent efforts of the composer. All that it has to say was brought out clearly, forcibly and satisfyingly by the intelligent and sympathetic reading accorded it by Mr. Paur.

Miss Olive Mead proved to be a young artist of fine musical instinct, and of really exceptional ability. She has a large and full tone, her intonation is without a flaw, her bowing is free and graceful, and her technique is remarkable in its easy fluency, its certainty and its finish. She plays in a style marked by elegance, breadth and distinction, with confidence and authority, and with thorough musicianly taste.

Her performance of the Saint-Saens concerto was very beautiful, indeed, in all that regards the technical essentials of her art and maturity of skill generally. From the beginning to the end of her efforts her playing was singularly interesting and attractive in its freedom from affectation and in its frank sincerity. The slow movement was given with delightful purity of taste and grace of phrasing, and in the more brilliant and exacting moments of the work she acquitted herself with unfailing exactness.

Miss Mead is decidedly an artist of whom much may be confidently expected when she has grown in experience and has gained something more of warmth, variety and passionateness in expression. The honor of so young an artist appearing at a Symphony concert was fully justified by the admirably guided talent that she manifested. She at once won the good will of her audience, which applauded her with exceptional enthusiasm after each movement, and vigorously recalled her four or five times at the end of the concerto. Her success was overwhelming. Miss Mead has studied under Mr. Kneisel, who may well take pride in his pupil.

The next programme is to be devoted to Tschaikowsky, of whose works the following are to be given: Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique"; concerto for piano No. 2 (for the first time at these concerts); and the overture, "1812." The soloist will be Mr. Alexander Siloti.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 31, 1898.

Meyerbeer and Sgambati in the Symphony Concert.

Meyerbeer's Overture to "Struensee," with which the concert of Saturday began, was like a buoy set in a yacht race, for it served to show how far the modern orchestral craft had sailed. There was a time when this work was thought too complex, and its orchestration was considered something wonderfully fine; now it is regarded as a very simple affair,

"And none so poor to do it reverence."

Nevertheless it presented some dramatic points, and its chief theme was not an unattractive bit of melody. Its counterpoint was not in any degree awe-inspiring, and its occasional blatancy caused one to remember how the gentle Schumann became fiery when rebuking the footlight-flavor of Meyerbeer.

Spite of all the attacks, Meyerbeer has made some wonderful bits of scoring; his use of English horn in the grand duo of the "Huguenots," his grand drum crescendos in the Benediction of the Poignards, his employment of Bass Clarinette in the finale of the same opera, his kettle-drum melody in the second act of "Robert," his bassoon passages at the Rising of the Nuns, and a host of other instances, might be adduced to prove the man more of a genius than a charlatan.

The old monks abused the Roman Coliseum but used its stones to build their churches; the modern composers have treated Meyerbeer in very much the same fashion. The performance of the overture was brilliant and its dramatic character lost nothing in Mr. Paur's reading.

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist of the concert. She appeared in St. Saens violin concerto in B minor. The great violin concertos can be easily counted on the fingers of one hand, and this one is not of them. It is prolix, ornate after the manner of violin concertos, and makes a long story out of a very short message. Miss Olive Mead played it in a chaste and blameless manner.

Although comparisons are always a thankless task, one could not help remembering the mighty breadth of Isaye in his debut in this work, three years ago, and contrasting it with the suavity of the present performance; Achilles in petticoats was not more out of place than the passion of St. Saens clothed in a Chesterfieldian imperturbability. In short it was the right thing in the wrong place, the right artist in the wrong composition.

Judged purely as violin-playing Miss Mead's work becomes worthy of great commendation; the intonation was delightfully pure and there was a surety in her work that imparted a sense of confidence to the auditor. The passages in harmonics at the end of the second movement were given with remarkable purity, and the brilliant fioriture of the finale had not a suspicion of blur. As a consequence Miss Mead was recalled again and again, with great enthusiasm, by the large audience.

Chabrier's prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" came next; it is a strong contrast to the overture to the work, that being all tumult, kettledrum, and piccolo, while this is of Goldmarkian sensuousness. Probably this prelude pictures the nuptials of Gwendoline and Harold, and its gloomier touches, the melancholy of the English horn, the dark tones of the deepest wood-wind, presage the betrayal and massacre of the Danes.

It is a pretty story (Catulle Mendes, the writer of filth, produces a pure and noble picture in this libretto) and here the music seems closely wedded to the tale. Naturally it erquires the most perfect of shading, and the nuances of the orchestra deserve all praise.

Among the blind the one-eyed man is King; among the Italians Sgambati is regarded as a great symphonic composer. When this symphony was first performed in Vienna, a musical wit called it a great exhibition of Musical Cookery. The witticism holds; Italian themes are cooked in the German manner, and just as Richard Strauss (in his "In Italy") labelled his Hochheimer "Chianti," we find Sgambati calling his Chianti "Hochheimer," and he cooks his Italian thoughts with plenty of German sauce. Liszt is to blame for all this, and the fault stands out more clearly on a second hearing of the work.

There was no valid reason for a second hearing of the symphony, except perhaps the possession of the score and parts, and sufficient honor was done to the orchestral pioneer of a vocal nation, by the presentation of the work four years ago.

The national flavor is present in the symphony, perceptible even under its Teutonic disguise, in the employment of the old Roman ecclesiastical modes and in the folk-song character of the Serenade.

That a composer who betrays effort in his work (although the resultant movements are musicianly) and who has no very perceptible glow of thematic invention, should add an extra movement to the regular symphonic four, was certainly unwise. Yet the added movement is probably, together with the Scherzo, the most spontaneous part of the whole symphony.

The leading over from the Serenade into the Finale (for the two last movements are joined together a la Beethoven), is rather abrupt, and the sudden tumult of the finale is as unexpected as if an irate father had suddenly appeared at a window and violently broken up the serenade! Yet the finale gained somewhat on a second hearing; there is in it a proper brilliancy and a sufficiency of effective contrast.

The chief charge to be made against the composer is that he is not his natural self; he is continually striving to do something in the style of the masters whom Liszt caused him to worship, and the effect is apparent. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is more Italian than this work of the Roman composer.

Much may be expected from Sgambati when he becomes less learned and more natural. As it is, this symphony may be regarded as an epoch work in Italian musical history, and the world owes Sgambati thanks for the orchestral wedge which he has pushed into Italy. But we need not study his symphony any more in the Music Hall concerts.
Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 30, 1898.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert, Emil Paur, Conductor, in Music Hall Last Night—Miss Olive Mead Was the Solo Violinist.

The program of the 13th Symphony Concert was as follows:

Overture to "Struensee"............Meyerbeer
Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor,
Op. 61..............................Saint-Saëns
Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline"....
Chabrier
Symphony No. 1, in D major, Op.16..
Sgambati

Mr. Apthrop's statement that the overture to "Struensee" is "indeed the only orchestral composition of Meyerbeer's that has held its place in the serious concert repertory" is too sweeping. As a matter of fact, the incidental music to "Struensee" has been given several times of late years in Paris at serious concerts, as at the Chatelet.

Surely there is no good reason for the frequent performance of this overture. It is laboriously made and of little or no effect. Meyerbeer's hands were supported, when he was strongest, by the stage carpenter and the scene painter. In his operas there are a few great moments and a singular wealth of ingenious detail. Many borrowed freely from him, and the most ungrateful of these borrowers was Wagner. When Meyerbeer was obliged to write orchestral music without the aid of the footlights, he cut a sorry figure. Take this overture, for instance; how cut and dried it is—without nobility or beauty or breadth of theme—without true skill in the development. How hopelessly old-fashioned and futile is the orchestration! Nowhere is there substantial thought. Nowhere is there any sustained flight of imagination, however near the ground.

⁂

Miss Mead is the third female violinist who has made her appearance at a Symphony concert in Music Hall.

The first was Mrs. Terese Liebe, who appeared with her brother Theodor Liebe, a 'cellist, and Mr. Henschel in Beethoven's concerto in C for piano, violin, and 'cello, Jan. 21, 1882. In the same concert she played with her brother an andante for violin and 'cello from Henschel's suite op. 23. It was at this concert that Mr. Henschel acted as conductor, composer and pianist.

Mrs. Camilla Urso was the next. She played, March 3, 1888, Rubinstein's concerto op. 46, and she appeared again in 1892.

Miss Mead has a smooth, fluent, well-developed technic. Her tone is full and pure, and she plays with ease and accuracy. She is a pupil of whom any teacher of technic might well be proud. But last night she displayed icy musical indifference. There was no warmth. There was no feeling; there was no suggestion of emotion. The uniform strength of her tone became monotonous. She did not essay, even in parrot fashion, dynamic gradations. In a word, her performance was icily regular and soulless.

The prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline" is beautiful music, and repetition does not stale it. Mr. Paur read it sympathetically, as he did the symphony that followed. This symphony is ingeniously put together and there are effective passages, but I find it, as a whole, carefully thought out and without genuine spontaneity. Sgambati could not free himself in this symphony from ecclesiastical association. You are reminded constantly of the plain-song of the church, which intrudes even in the Scherzo. I wish Sgambati had been content to stay on his own side of the Alps and had not been afraid of being called an Italian. Liszt has other sins to answer for than the creation of the Liszt pupil; and Sgambati's admiration for Liszt is an injury to the individuality of his art.

Philip Hale.

SATURDAY EVENING
GAZETTE, BOSTON, JANUARY 29,

The Symphony Orchestra gave its thirteenth concert of the season last evening in Music Hall. The program was:

Overture, "Struensee,"............Meyerbeer
Concerto for Violin, No. 3, B minor, op.
61 ....Saint-Saens
Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline"..Chabrier
Symphony No. 1, D major, op. 16....Sgambati

The program was very pleasant throughout, and there was a graceful and uninterrupted curve of descent from the flippancies of the overture to the solidity of the symphony. The overture, of course, is a very delightful work, but it is too easily understood, perhaps, to suit modern taste. The Chabrier prelude is equally pleasant and more modern. It is what the program eloquently calls freiphantasierend, and in its dreamy meanderings, leading no whither, it arouses the state of perplexed doubt that is the foundation of art conviction. The Sgambati symphony wears well, especially in spots. It is an honest, solid work: at times brilliant and passionate, and there are discoverable and original ideas, as well as the rich fringes of learning. It was interpreted with fine vigor and with the most faultless taste by the orchestra.

The interest of the concert, however, centered in the soloist, Miss Olive Mead. This artist has steadily improved in her work, and has now reached the point of excellence where she may successfully challenge comparison with older violinists. She has taste, intelligence and skill, and she is the interpreter as well as the player. Her work at this concert was most satisfactory and most delightful. She reached to the very heart of her work, reading it like a true artist—her phrasing showing rare intelligence—and playing it with rare technical skill. It was a most finished, careful and thoughtful piece of work, played in a large, broad, fluent style and with unaffected sincerity. There were brilliancy, grace, solidity and feeling, and excuses on the plea of youth were not needed. The difficulties of the work were conquered by Miss Mead with graceful ease, but excellent as is her technique, large and free as is her bowing, she compels one to listen to her as artist, and full satisfaction is the result. Miss Mead deservedly won the admiration and enthusiasm of her audience, and if her progress in the future is as rapid as in the past she will soon stand in the very front rank of her art.

At the next concert there will be a Tschaikowsky program, including the Sixth Symphony, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, and the "1812" overture. The soloist will be Mr. Alexander Siloti.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN 30, 1898.

Olive Mead, Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

When a soloist is recalled again and again by a symphony rehearsal audience—usually undemonstrative to a degree—while artists of Mr Paur's orchestra joined enthusiastically in the plaudits of the time, the fact is significant of a very decided success indeed. The young violinist, Miss Olive Mead, in whose career a goodly number of residents in greater Boston are interested, is entitled to warm congratulations over a triumph that was at once popular and artistic.

The playing of the young artist in Saint-Saens' concerto for violin, No. 3, which constituted her offering to the symphony program last week, is in truth entitled to warm praise. Miss Mead is in every sense of the term the mistress of her instrument. If now and again she failed to evoke quite the strength of tone which an Ysaye was able to present in this concerto, in delicacy of touch, richness of tone and finely delicate appreciation of the composer's thought, Miss Mead's performance left nothing to be desired. Add to this that the embellished passages of the concerto were executed with a skill and speed that were the more marvelous because of the lack of all apparent effort in her playing, and the "reason why" of her noteworthy success will readily be understood.

The name of Olive Mead is well assured of a high place in the ranks of the distinguished women violinists of our time.

Meyerbeer opened the program. Perhaps the excellence of the presentation of the "Struensee" overture was due in a measure, at least, to a desire on the orchestra's part to show that the works of composers of schools old as well as new will receive careful and appreciative treatment at the hands of Mr Paur's players.

The prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" found careful performance, and Sgambati's first symphony, which fairly tested, in its varied demands, the resources and skill of our famous orchestra, was played with much spirit and success. The symphony is rather lengthy as a wind-up for a concert, but there's no denying that it has many beauties well worth setting forth.

A Tschaikowsky program is announced for this week. The celebrated pianist, Mr Alexander Siloti, is to present the composer's second concerto for piano for the first hearing at the symphony concerts, and the "Pathetique" symphony with the overture "1812" will be included among the offerings.

BOSTON COURIER.
JANUARY 30, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

The unus[illegible] array of violin solos which has been [illegible] at this season's Symphony [illegible] an addition in the naming upon [illegible] programme of Saint-Saens's third [illegible] Miss Olive Mead, who has [illegible] of late from an interesting child-pla[illegible] accomplished young artist. This [illegible] fanciful and elegant, appeals [illegible] and the musician of deeper feeling, [illegible] easily occupy the full attention and art [illegible] artists as Sarasate, to whom it was dedicated, [illegible] Ysaye, who first played it in Boston. [illegible] depths and heights which M[illegible] yet sound and scale, goes without sa[illegible] it bespeaks at times the dash [illegible] sweep and the ardent force which [illegible] show. Yet her performance [illegible] essentials of high art. [illegible] in comprehension and defini[illegible]; she was decisive, if not powerful, [illegible] passages, while for the others [illegible] sustained cantabile, an exact and [illegible] and a pure, unblemished tone. [illegible], her roulades well proportioned and [illegible] liquid and true. Had warmth [illegible] been present in any marked degree, [illegible] been little to which reasonable criticism [illegible], for Miss Mead gave pleasure and [illegible] by the simple, honest, effective goodness [illegible] playing. The orchestral part was most [illegible] agreeably delivered, particularly in the [illegible] third movements, where so many [illegible] are made upon the solo lines.

The overt[illegible] was Meyerbeer's to the tragedy of "Struensee," [illegible] comparatively unfamiliar one to the concert room. Its broad, serious, church-like introduction [illegible] its dramatic main body were well presented [illegible] a decided impression.

The [illegible] were acquaintances—the prelude to the [illegible] act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and Sgamba[illegible]'s first symphony, which reveals more and more of its spiritual depth, its emotional power, its original thought and its ability to express these, at every [illegible].

The next [illegible] is all from Tschaikowsky and includes these numbers: The "Pathetic" symphony; the [illegible] pianoforte concerto, with Mr. Siloti to play [illegible] and the "1812" overture.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

B[illegible] Trans[illegible]

MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 18[illegible]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Meyerbeer: Overture to "Struensee."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor, opus 61.
Chabrier: Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
Sgambati: Symphony No. 1, in D major, opus 16.
Miss Olive Mead was the violinist.

Every few years Meyerbeer Polymetis crops up again at a symphony concert and repeats his one orchestral speech—the overture to "Struensee." True, the man of many operatic wiles has other speeches in his barrel, but the "Struensee" overture is the only one in which he in the least catches the tone of such dignified solemnities. Here he has—apparently much to his own regret, and perhaps still more to that of his hearers—consented to lay aside his favorite bass drum, cymbals, snare drum and triangle, and attunes his tongue to the nobler dialect of the legitimate symphony orchestra. We must own that we like him better on his own ground, the operatic stage; for this one bid of his at orchestral respectability seems to us very like a failure. It has been said of Meyerbeer that "he needed the spur of a really lofty theme, of a highly poetic situation, to enable him to rise into a high musical atmosphere; he could not evolve really great music out of his own brain alone, and it may safely be said that, of his purely instrumental works, not one is of great value. Of these latter, his overture to 'Struensee' should probably be given the first place; but you would pierce it clean through the heart by comparing it with an overture by Schumann, Mendelssohn, or even Weber—let alone Beethoven." The thing, with all its learning, is trivial; perhaps most trivial of all in its "learning." In listening to it, you pass from an amused smile to a yawn; and wish the composer to the deuce before it is over.

Chabrier's entr'acte from his "Gwendoline" impresses one more and more by its poetic, imaginative beauty, the more one hears it. Here you find true genius speaking its own language. When the opera was given in Paris, in 1893, some of the critics found this entr'acte a "long and useless movement." Perhaps the same critics might reverse this judgment today; but, whatever its theatrical uselessness may be, it is certainly profoundly beautiful concert-music, in spite of its rather rambling, episodic character and its vagueness of form. That it is exceedingly difficult may safely be suspected; not technically difficult, perhaps, but in a higher than a merely technical sense. It has the subtler difficulty of much of Chopin's pianoforte music, which fully reveals its secret only to the born and predestined Chopin-player. We could not but feel, last Saturday evening, that the true gist and proportion of some passages were missed and the true expression distorted, fine as the performance was technically. Such music is almost entirely a matter of emotional nuance, and a miss in playing it is as good as a mile.

Sgambati's D major symphony does not strike one as a work of genius, but as a work of musicianship, cleverness, and taste. One feels the composer to be a man of culture and sensibility, a man who has something to say and knows still better how to say it; his writing shows something very like style. It is well worth while to give such a work now and then; one cannot be forever feasting on masterpieces. Only, we should have preferred it on another programme; a list of four compositions, two of them in several movements, in which only one—and that, the shortest—has the faintest claim to being considered a masterpiece, is a pretty dreary list. The symphony was well played, but, as it seemed to us, not particularly brilliantly. Indeed, the whole concert was rather dull.

Miss Olive Mead, a pupil of Mr. Kneisel's, comes forward as an admirably equipped violinist. Young and inexperienced though she be, she has a cool self-possession that many an older hand might envy her; it is not often that one finds a neophyte face a large audience with so untrembling a bow-arm. Her tone is warm, full, smooth and brilliant, her technique very highly developed; her phrasing is musicianly and graceful, and she gives evidence of fine and cultivated musical feeling. Hers is the honestest sort of violin-playing; straightforward, free from tricks, full of a warmth of sentiment which seems to be just now in the transition stage between girlish collowness and maturer depth. In a word, she made a very fine impression indeed, and was repeatedly and enthusiastically recalled.

The next programme is made up wholly of works by Tchaikovsky, as follows: symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 44; overture, "1812," opus 49. Mr. Alexander Siloti will be the pianist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Jan 31

Meyerbeer and Sgambati in the Symphony Concert.

Meyerbeer's Overture to "Struensee," with which the concert of Saturday began, was like a buoy set in a yacht race, for it served to show how far the modern orchestral craft had sailed. There was a time when this work was thought too complex, and its orchestration was considered something wonderfully fine; now it is regarded as a very simple affair,

"And none so poor to do it reverence."

Nevertheless it presented some dramatic points, and its chief theme was not an unattractive bit of melody. Its counterpoint was not in any degree awe-inspiring, and its occasional blatancy caused one to remember how the gentle Schumann became fiery when rebuking the footlight-flavor of Meyerbeer.

Spite of all the attacks, Meyerbeer has made some wonderful bits of scoring; his use of English horn in the grand duo of the "Huguenots," his grand drum crescendos in the Benediction of the Poignards, his employment of Bass Clarinette in the finale of the same opera, his kettle-drum melody in the second act of "Robert," his bassoon passages at the Rising of the Nuns, and a host of other instances, might be adduced to prove the man more of a genius than a charlatan.

The old monks abused the Roman Coliseum but used its stones to build their churches; the modern composers have treated Meyerbeer in very much the same fashion. The performance of the overture was brilliant and its dramatic character lost nothing in Mr. Paur's reading.

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist of the concert. She appeared in St. Saens violin concerto in B minor. The great violin concertos can be easily counted on the fingers of one hand, and this one is not of them. It is prolix, ornate after the manner of violin concertos, and makes a long story out of a very short message. Miss Olive Mead played it in a chaste and blameless manner.

Although comparisons are always a thankless task, one could not help remembering the mighty breadth of Isaye in his debut in this work, three years ago, and contrasting it with the suavity of the present performance; Achilles in petticoats was not more out of place than the passion of St. Saens clothed in a Chesterfieldian imperturbability. In short it was the right thing in the wrong place, the right artist in the wrong composition.

Judged purely as violin-playing Miss Mead's work becomes worthy of great commendation; the intonation was delightfully pure and there was a surety in her work that imparted a sense of confidence to the auditor. The passages in harmonics at the end of the second movement were given with remarkable purity, and the brilliant fioriture of the finale had not a suspicion of blur. As a consequence Miss Mead was recalled again and again, with great enthusiasm, by the large audience.

Chabrier's prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" came next; it is a strong contrast to the overture to the work, that being all tumult, kettledrum, and piccolo, while this is of Goldmarkian sensuousness. Probably this prelude pictures the nuptials of Gwendoline and Harold, and its gloomier touches, the melancholy of the English horn, the dark tones of the deepest wood-wind, presage the betrayal and massacre of the Danes.

It is a pretty story (Catulle Mendes, the writer of filth, produces a pure and noble picture in this libretto) and here the music seems closely wedded to the tale. Naturally it erquires the most perfect of shading, and the nuances of the orchestra deserve all praise.

Among the blind the one-eyed man is King; among the Italians Sgambati is regarded as a great symphonic composer. When this symphony was first performed in Vienna, a musical wit called it a great exhibition of Musical Cookery. The witticism holds; Italian themes are cooked in the German manner, and just as Richard Strauss (in his "In Italy") labelled his Hochheimer "Chianti," we find Sgambati calling his Chianti "Hochheimer," and he cooks his Italian thoughts with plenty of German sauce. Liszt is to blame for all this, and the fault stands out more clearly on a second hearing of the work.

There was no valid reason for a second hearing of the symphony, except perhaps the possession of the score and parts, and sufficient honor was done to the orchestral pioneer of a vocal nation, by the presentation of the work four years ago.

The national flavor is present in the symphony, perceptible even under its Teutonic disguise, in the employment of the old Roman ecclesiastical modes and in the folk-song character of the Serenade.

That a composer who betrays effort in his work (although the resultant movements are musicianly) and who has no very perceptible glow of thematic invention, should add an extra movement to the regular symphonic four, was certainly unwise. Yet the added movement is probably, together with the Scherzo, the most spontaneous part of the whole symphony.

The leading over from the Serenade into the Finale (for the two last movements are joined together a la Beethoven), is rather abrupt, and the sudden tumult of the finale is as unexpected as if an irate father had suddenly appeared at a window and violently broken up the serenade! Yet the finale gained somewhat on a second hearing; there is in it a proper brilliancy and a sufficiency of effective contrast.

The chief charge to be made against the composer is that he is not his natural self; he is continually striving to do something in the style of the masters whom Liszt caused him to worship, and the effect is apparent. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is more Italian than this work of the Roman composer.

Much may be expected from Sgambati when he becomes less learned and more natural. As it is, this symphony may be regarded as an epoch work in Italian musical history, and the world owes Sgambati thanks for the orchestral wedge which he has pushed into Italy. But we need not study his symphony any more in the Music Hall concerts.

Louis C. Elson.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifth in the Series Given in Infantry Hall.

The Excellent Program Was Given an Artistic Interpretation.

The fifth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall last evening received commendation from persons with critical musical sense well developed by reason of study and long experience, and by other persons who like music of every shade and degree. The better the music, the greater the enjoyment, consequently the feast offered on this occasion was delightfully filling. The product of the storm abridged the usual large attendance at these concerts slightly, but enough of the patrons of this peerless orchestra, fortunate enough to be near traveled highways, were present to make the audience of the kind known as large and fashionable. The principal thing of interest at this concert was the introduction of Mr. Alexander Siloti to a Providence audience interested in him because he had been heralded as one of the world's foremost pianoforte artists. His fame was endorsed by local experts and the audience gave him the kind of applause that may be set down as hospitable. There was nothing half-way about its spontaneity and its sincerity was recognized. The distinguished soloist felt compelled to bow in response to a half dozen recalls. A little more and the audience would have cheered. Another matter of more than passing interest was the premier presentation of Rimsky-Karsakoff's suite, which received wonderful treatment from the orchestra and its scholarly and all-prevailing conductor, Mr. Emil Paur. It is safe to say that this one was the best concert of the series. This opinion may be pasted in hats to be applied to the next concert, for, according to the popular verdict each succeeding concert is the best. Why not? There is nothing better. The only variation of appreciation is limited to the temperament of the listener and so we will voice the popular conclusion. The program was as follows:

Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 747.
I. Adagio (B minor) 4-4.
Allegro non troppo (B minor) 4-4.
II. Allegro con grazia (D major) 5-4
III. Allegro molto vivace (G major) 4-4 (12-8).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B minor) 3-4.
Franz Schubert, Grand Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), Op. 15.
(Symphonically rearranged for Pianoforte and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo (C major) 4-4
II. Adagio (C-sharp minor) 4-4
III. Presto (A-flat major) 3-4
IV. Allegro (C major) 4-4
Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35
I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship:
Largo maestoso—Allegro non troppo.
III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
Andantino quasi allegretto.
IV. Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship:
Allegro molto e frenetico—Vivo—Allegro.

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony was no stranger as it was played by this orchestra here in the March concert two years ago. It is now considered to be one of the most famous compositions of modern times, yet it has been in the hands of musicians only a little more than two years. It has been truly said that this work alone would have made the everlasting fame of the author. The composer, touched with the divine fire, died shortly after its first performance and by those most intimate with him, the last movement, Adiago Lamentoso, is said to be his own requiem. It is fit to be the final leave taking of a child of genius for it stands with the great. It was superbly played.

Mr. Alexander Siloti, the soloist, arrived in this country a little more than a week ago, and Providence, therefore, enjoyed a world's celebrity before its larger sister cities interested in the best product of the musical world. He made his debut in New York a week ago Tuesday evening, and was declared to be an artist of the first rank. That conclusion was ratified last evening, and the eminent Russian could not help being pleased with the ovation bestowed. He is said to be one of the most accomplished pianists in Europe, and before his departure he will enjoy the same distinction on two continents. He is a pupil of Franz Liszt and Nicolas Rubinstein, and is but 35 years of age. He first played in Moscow 18 years ago and recently he made a tour of Europe. There was nothing of the freak about him, and as he appeared upon the platform last evening, bereft of sensational trimmings except a shapely six-foot slender figure, broad shoulders and all the exterior indications of an athlete, with a fine shaped head and handsome, intelligent face, the onlookers were impressed with the fact that the young man was mentally and physically endowed for his art. Then he sat at the instrument and proceeded to demonstrate that there could be no possible disappointment in him. By only one player has he been eclipsed in this city. Perhaps there are some who will maintain that he is not inferior to Paderewski. That will be a matter for individual taste. Both are great. Siloti's repose and authority are wonderful, and his precision is marvelous. [illegible] "Wanderer" [illegible] ten as a concerto with orchestral accompaniment by Liszt, gave the distinguished visitor wide scope and he displayed his powerful energy, appreciation, wonderful facility, in tone, color, delicacy and breadth, and altogether gave a masterful interpretation of the great work, and did it without any fuss. His playing was appreciated for itself and the reward was ample.

The closing number for the orchestra was Russian, too, making the whole program Russian, so to speak. This was a novelty, and as such it commanded attention. There was one peculiarity about this work that attracted especial attention. It gave solos to several instruments and it did not suffer in the least at the hands of this band of soloists. Mr. Kneisel had a liberal share of the solos, and he made exquisite tones on his violin. The wood, wind and brass instruments had a share and the harp was not ignored. The 'cellos had a chance, too, and when the whole orchestra was engaged the effect was tremendous. Conductor Paur appeared to be able to draw any kind of a tone and his control of all forces was astonishing. Another pleasing peculiarity of the composition was the constant recurrence between the phrase of the song-like melody of rapidly rising and falling scale passages, generally in the clarinet, but at times also in the flute or first violin. The combination of triangle, drum and cymbals was also agreeable because of its novelty. Many themes were worked up together with infinite elaborateness, making a wild jollification. Frequently it suggested a revel by a band of lunatics, the effect was so terrific on the march theme. The author took his story from "The Arabian Nights," and he is one of the acknowledged leaders of the so-called young Russian school of composers. The "Scheherazade" was modern in every feature. It requires no stretch of the imagination to conjure what this splendid orchestra did with such an opportunity for solo and concerted playing. It was simply immense.

The next concert by this orchestra will take place Wednesday evening, March 9.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 29, 1898.

NORDICA, BEETHOVEN AND KALAMAZOO MUSICIANS.

At the rehearsal last week Mme. Nordica was not pleased to find that Mr. Kneisel, eminent musician as he is, had come to direct the orchestra in place of Mr. Paur. She wanted the regular conductor and nobody else, says the "Sun." But she started in with the rehearsal of "Ah, Perfido," which for one reason or another did not go just as well as Mme. Nordica thought it should. There was some discussion of the subject between Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kneisel.

"Well, in the way the accompaniment is played, it certainly does not show off my voice," said Mme. Nordica.

"As much as I admire your voice and your art," answered Mr. Kneisel, "I cannot alter Beethoven's music to display them, however great the improvement might be."

It was shortly after this that Kalamazoo musicians and other words descriptive of undeveloped musical taste began to be heard in the chilly atmosphere of the Metropolitan Opera House.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the thirteenth Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Meyerbeer: Overture to "Struensee."
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for violin, No. 3, in B minor, opus 61.
Chabrier: Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
Sgambati: Symphony No. 1, in D major, opus 16.
Miss Olive Mead was the violinist.

Meyerbeer Polymetis

Every few years Meyerbeer crops up again at a symphony concert and repeats his one orchestral speech—the overture to "Struensee." True, the man of many operatic wiles has other speeches in his barrel, but the "Struensee" overture is the only one in which he in the least catches the tone of such dignified solemnities. Here he has—apparently much to his own regret, and perhaps still more to that of his hearers—consented to lay aside his favorite bass drum, cymbals, snare drum and triangle, and attunes his tongue to the nobler dialect of the legitimate symphony orchestra. We must own that we like him better on his own ground, the operatic stage; for this one bid of his at orchestral respectability seems to us very like a failure. It has been said of Meyerbeer that "he needed the spur of a really lofty theme, of a highly poetic situation, to enable him to rise into a high musical atmosphere; he could not evolve really great music out of his own brain alone, and it may safely be said that, of his purely instrumental works, not one is of great value. Of these latter, his overture to 'Struensee' should probably be given the first place; but you would pierce it clean through the heart by comparing it with an overture by Schumann, Mendelssohn, or even Weber—let alone Beethoven." The thing, with all its learning, is trivial; perhaps most trivial of all in its "learning." In listening to it, you pass from an amused smile to a yawn; and wish the composer to the deuce before it is over.

Chabrier's entr'acte from his "Gwendoline" impresses one more and more by its poetic, imaginative beauty, the more one hears it. Here you find true genius speaking its own language. When the opera was given in Paris, in 1893, some of the critics found this entr'acte a "long and useless movement." Perhaps the same critics might reverse this judgment today; but, whatever its theatrical uselessness may be, it is certainly profoundly beautiful concert-music, in spite of its rather rambling, episodic character and its vagueness of form. That it is exceedingly difficult may safely be suspected; not technically difficult, perhaps, but in a higher than a merely technical sense. It has the subtler difficulty of much of Chopin's pianoforte music, which fully reveals its secret only to the born and predestined Chopin-player. We could not but feel, last Saturday evening, that the true gist and proportion of some passages were missed and the true expression distorted, fine as the performance was technically. Such music is almost entirely a matter of emotional nuance, and a miss in playing it is as good as a mile.

Sgambati's D major symphony does not strike one as a work of genius, but as a work of musicianship, cleverness, and taste. One feels the composer to be a man of culture and sensibility, a man who has something to say and knows still better how to say it; his writing shows something very like style. It is well worth while to give such a work now and then; one cannot be forever feasting on masterpieces. Only, we should have preferred it on another programme; a list of four compositions, two of them in several movements, in which only one—and that, the shortest—has the faintest claim to being considered a masterpiece, is a pretty dreary list. The symphony was well played, but, as it seemed to us, not particularly brilliantly. Indeed, the whole concert was rather dull.

Miss Olive Mead, a pupil of Mr. Kneisel's, comes forward as an admirably equipped violinist. Young and inexperienced though she be, she has a cool self-possession that many an older hand might envy her; it is not often that one finds a neophyte face a large audience with so untrembling a bow-arm. Her tone is warm, full, smooth and brilliant, her technique very highly developed; her phrasing is musicianly and graceful, and she gives evidence of fine and cultivated musical feeling. Hers is the honestest sort of violin-playing; straightforward, free from tricks, full of a warmth of sentiment which seems to be just now in the transition stage between girlish collowness and maturer depth. In a word, she made a very fine impression indeed, and was repeatedly and enthusiastically recalled.

The next programme is made up wholly of works by Tchaikovsky, as follows: symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G minor, opus 44; overture, "1812," opus 49. Mr. Alexander Siloti will be the pianist.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Jan 31

Meyerbeer and Sgambati in the Symphony Concert.

Meyerbeer's Overture to "Struensee," with which the concert of Saturday began, was like a buoy set in a yacht race, for it served to show how far the modern orchestral craft had sailed. There was a time when this work was thought too complex, and its orchestration was considered something wonderfully fine; now it is regarded as a very simple affair,

"And none so poor to do it reverence."

Nevertheless it presented some dramatic points, and its chief theme was not an unattractive bit of melody. Its counterpoint was not in any degree awe-inspiring, and its occasional blatancy caused one to remember how the gentle Schumann became fiery when rebuking the footlight-flavor of Meyerbeer.

Spite of all the attacks, Meyerbeer has made some wonderful bits of scoring; his use of English horn in the grand duo of the "Huguencts," his grand drum crescendos in the Benediction of the Poignards, his employment of Bass Clarinette in the finale of the same opera, his kettle-drum melody in the second act of "Robert," his bassoon passages at the Rising of the Nuns, and a host of other instances, might be adduced to prove the man more of a genius than a charlatan.

The old monks abused the Roman Coliseum but used its stones to build their churches; the modern composers have treated Meyerbeer in very much the same fashion. The performance of the overture was brilliant and its dramatic character lost nothing in Mr. Paur's reading.

Miss Olive Mead was the soloist of the concert. She appeared in St. Saens violin concerto in B minor. The great violin concertos can be easily counted on the fingers of one hand, and this one is not of them. It is prolix, ornate after the manner of violin concertos, and makes a long story out of a very short message. Miss Olive Mead played it in a chaste and blameless manner.

Although comparisons are always a thankless task, one could not help remembering the mighty breadth of Isaye in his debut in this work, three years ago, and contrasting it with the suavity of the present performance; Achilles in petticoats was not more out of place than the passion of St. Saens clothed in a Chesterfieldian imperturbability. In short it was the right thing in the wrong place, the right artist in the wrong composition.

Judged purely as violin-playing Miss Mead's work becomes worthy of great commendation; the intonation was delightfully pure and there was a surety in her work that imparted a sense of confidence to the auditor. The passages in harmonics at the end of the second movement were given with remarkable purity, and the brilliant fioriture of the finale had not a suspicion of blur. As a consequence Miss Mead was recalled again and again, with great enthusiasm, by the large audience.

Chabrier's prelude to the second act of "Gwendoline" came next; it is a strong contrast to the overture to the work, that being all tumult, kettledrum, and piccolo, while this is of Goldmarkian sensuousness. Probably this prelude pictures the nuptials of Gwendoline and Harold, and its gloomier touches, the melancholy of the English horn, the dark tones of the deepest wood-wind, presage the betrayal and massacre of the Danes.

It is a pretty story (Catulle Mendes, the writer of filth, produces a pure and noble picture in this libretto) and here the music seems closely wedded to the tale. Naturally it erquires the most perfect of shading, and the nuances of the orchestra deserve all praise.

Among the blind the one-eyed man is King; among the Italians Sgambati is regarded as a great symphonic composer. When this symphony was first performed in Vienna, a musical wit called it a great exhibition of Musical Cookery. The witticism holds; Italian themes are cooked in the German manner, and just as Richard Strauss (in his "In Italy") labelled his Hochheimer "Chianti," we find Sgambati calling his Chianti "Hochheimer," and he cooks his Italian thoughts with plenty of German sauce. Liszt is to blame for all this, and the fault stands out more clearly on a second hearing of the work.

There was no valid reason for a second hearing of the symphony, except perhaps the possession of the score and parts, and sufficient honor was done to the orchestral pioneer of a vocal nation, by the presentation of the work four years ago.

The national flavor is present in the symphony, perceptible even under its Teutonic disguise, in the employment of the old Roman ecclesiastical modes and in the folk-song character of the Serenade.

That a composer who betrays effort in his work (although the resultant movements are musicianly) and who has no very perceptible glow of thematic invention, should add an extra movement to the regular symphonic four, was certainly unwise. Yet the added movement is probably, together with the Scherzo, the most spontaneous part of the whole symphony.

The leading over from the Serenade into the Finale (for the two last movements are joined together a la Beethoven), is rather abrupt, and the sudden tumult of the finale is as unexpected as if an irate father had suddenly appeared at a window and violently broken up the serenade! Yet the finale gained somewhat on a second hearing; there is in it a proper brilliancy and a sufficiency of effective contrast.

The chief charge to be made against the composer is that he is not his natural self; he is continually striving to do something in the style of the masters whom Liszt caused him to worship, and the effect is apparent. Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony is more Italian than this work of the Roman composer.

Much may be expected from Sgambati when he becomes less learned and more natural. As it is, this symphony may be regarded as an epoch work in Italian musical history, and the world owes Sgambati thanks for the orchestral wedge which he has pushed into Italy. But we need not study his symphony any more in the Music Hall concerts. Louis C. Elson.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifth in the Series Given in Infantry Hall.

The Excellent Program Was Given an Artistic Interpretation.

The fifth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry hall last evening received commendation from persons with critical musical sense well developed by reason of study and long experience, and by other persons who like music of every shade and degree. The better the music, the greater the enjoyment, consequently the feast offered on this occasion was delightfully filling. The product of the storm abridged the usual large attendance at these concerts slightly, but enough of the patrons of this peerless orchestra, fortunate enough to be near traveled highways, were present to make the audience of the kind known as large and fashionable. The principal thing of interest at this concert was the introduction of Mr. Alexander Siloti to a Providence audience interested in him because he had been heralded as one of the world's foremost pianoforte artists. His fame was endorsed by local experts and the audience gave him the kind of applause that may be set down as hospitable. There was nothing half-way about its spontaneity and its sincerity was recognized. The distinguished soloist felt compelled to bow in response to a half dozen recalls. A little more and the audience would have cheered. Another matter of more than passing interest was the premier presentation of Rimsky-Karsakoff's suite, which received wonderful treatment from the orchestra and its scholarly and all-prevailing conductor, Mr. Emil Paur. It is safe to say that this one was the best concert of the series. This opinion may be pasted in hats to be applied to the next concert, for, according to the popular verdict each succeeding concert is the best. Why not? There is nothing better. The only variation of appreciation is limited to the temperament of the listener and so we will voice the popular conclusion. The program was as follows:

Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," Op. 747.
I. Adagio (B minor) 4-4.
Allegro non troppo (B minor) 4-4.
II. Allegro con grazia (D major) 5-4
III. Allegro molto vivace (G major) 4-4 (12-8).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B minor) 3-4.
Franz Schubert, Grand Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), Op. 15.
(Symphonically rearranged for Pianoforte and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo (C major) 4-4
II. Adagio (C-sharp minor) 4-4
III. Presto (A-flat major) 3-4
IV. Allegro (C major) 4-4
Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35
I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship:
Largo maestoso—Allegro non troppo.
III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
Andantino quasi allegretto.
IV. Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship:
Allegro molto e frenetico—Vivo—Allegro.

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony was no stranger as it was played by this orchestra here in the March concert two years ago. It is now considered to be one of the most famous compositions of modern times, yet it has been in the hands of musicians only a little more than two years. It has been truly said that this work alone would have made the everlasting fame of the author. The composer, touched with the divine fire, died shortly after its first performance and by those most intimate with him, the last movement, Adiago Lamentoso, is said to be his own requiem. It is fit to be the final leave taking of a child of genius for it stands with the great. It was superbly played.

Mr. Alexander Siloti, the soloist, arrived in this country a little more than a week ago, and Providence, therefore, enjoyed a world's celebrity before its larger sister cities interestd in the best product of the musical world. He made his debut in New York a week ago Tuesday evening, and was declared to be an artist of the first rank. That conclusion was ratified last evening, and the eminent Russian could not help being pleased with the ovation bestowed. He is said to be one of the most accomplished pianists in Europe, and before his departure he will enjoy the same distinction on two continents. He is a pupil of Franz Liszt and Nicolas Rubinstein, and is but 35 years of age. He first played in Moscow 18 years ago and recently he made a tour of Europe. There was nothing of the freak about him, and as he appeared upon the platform last evening, bereft of sensational trimmings except a shapely six-foot slender figure, broad shoulders and all the exterior indications of an athlete, with a fine shaped head and handsome, intelligent face, the onlookers were impressed with the fact that the young man was mentally and physically endowed for his art. Then he sat at the instrument and proceeded to demonstrate that there could be no possible disappointment in him. By only one player has he been eclipsed in this city. Perhaps there are some who will maintain that he is not inferior to Paderewski. That will be a matter for individual taste. Both are great. Siloti's repose and authority are wonderful, and his precision is marvelous. Schubert's Wanderer Fantasy, rewritten as a concerto with orchestral accompaniment by Liszt, gave the distinguished visitor wide scope and he displayed his powerful energy, appreciation, wonderful facility, in tone, color, delicacy and breadth, and altogether gave a masterful interpretation of the great work, and did it without any fuss. His playing was appreciated for itself and the reward was ample.

The closing number for the orchestra was Russian, too, making the whole program Russian, so to speak. This was a novelty, and as such it commanded attention. There was one peculiarity about this work that attracted especial attention. It gave solos to several instruments and it did not suffer in the least at the hands of this band of soloists. Mr. Kneisel had a liberal share of the solos, and he made exquisite tones on his violin. The wood, wind and brass instruments had a share and the harp was not ignored. The 'cellos had a chance, too, and when the whole orchestra was engaged the effect was tremendous. Conductor Paur appeared to be able to draw any kind of a tone and his control of all forces was astonishing. Another pleasing peculiarity of the composition was the constant recurrence between the phrase of the song-like melody of rapidly rising and falling scale passages, generally in the clarinet, but at times also in the flute or first violin. The combination of triangle, drum and cymbals was also agreeable because of its novelty. Many themes were worked up together with infinite elaborateness, making a wild jollification. Frequently it suggested a revel by a band of lunatics, the effect was so terrific on the march theme. The author took his story from "The Arabian Nights," and he is one of the acknowledged leaders of the so-called young Russian school of composers. The "Scheherazade" was modern in every feature. It requires no stretch of thelimagination to conjure what this splendid orchestra did with such an opportunity for solo and concerted playing. It was simply immense.

The next concert by this orchestra will take place Wednesday evening, March 9.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JAN. 29, 1898.

NORDICA, BEETHOVEN AND KALAMAZOO MUSICIANS.

At the rehearsal last week Mme. Nordica was not pleased to find that Mr. Kneisel, eminent musician as he is, had come to direct the orchestra in place of Mr. Paur. She wanted the regular conductor and nobody else, says the "Sun." But she started in with the rehearsal of "Ah, Perfido," which for one reason or another did not go just as well as Mme. Nordica thought it should. There was some discussion of the subject between Mme. Nordica and Mr. Kneisel.

"Well, in the way the accompaniment is played, it certainly does not show off my voice," said Mme. Nordica.

"As much as I admire your voice and your art," answered Mr. Kneisel, "I cannot alter Beethoven's music to display them, however great the improvement might be."

It was shortly after this that Kalamazoo musicians and other words descriptive of undeveloped musical taste began to be heard in the chilly atmosphere of the Metropolitan Opera House.

FAMOUS PEOPLE AT HOME.

XL.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

WHEN Mr. Dickens made his first visit to America he found a great monotony of types, which, being crude in themselves, became inordinately wearisome in the repetition of Colonel Divers, Jefferson Bricks, and Major Pawkinses. The newer civilization does not permit the development of individuality. It is the "middle grayness" of social progress. The savage aboriginal is a free man, and the fine flower of culture has variety. Nature has been enslaved from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the commonplace result has supervened, to be followed, as time goes on, by the breaking forth of personality and individual characteristics. Here in the East two hundred and fifty years have developed them and Americans have begun to be interesting, while west of the Mississippi there are still great regions where social incubation is still taking place.

The Higginson line possesses plenty of vigor and color, and has drawn into its life influences from the whole history of New England,—the stringency of the Puritan, the loyalty of the colonist, the fervor of the patriot, the ardor of the philanthropist, the devotion of the soldier, the patriotism of the citizen. No one can have a word with Henry Lee Higginson without appreciating the variety and complications of his nature, that inheritance of the man which is an enrichment of heart and mind and manner — what is properly meant by the much-misused word "culture" as we apply it in the laboratory, correctly, instead of its artificial use for a kind of veneer. Brusque of manner, independent of speech, unassuming, everything that a manners book would ignore,—is a gentleman. A delicacy of feeling, restraint, ready perception, calm self-possession, deference given and demanded,— such are the qualities which what we call civilization has produced, which are the servants of a strong individuality and which are soon apprehended by one who has the faculty of appreciating such things. Impertinence or presumption would fare hardly with Colonel Higginson; a spade is a spade to him when the occasion for a definition arises, and he is capable of heat and passion and invective when righteous wrath is appropriate. Yet for gentle courtesy, for thoughtful kindness, for hidden generosity, for big benefactions from a right hand to which the left, with all the world, is an absolute stranger,— still more for a manly sentiment which has, on some few occasions, escaped its control and exhibited itself in romantic enthusiasm,— Mr. Higginson stands the very embodiment. It is such a man, not one who is a mere symbol for some imputed qualities through common rumor, one who is made up of apparent contrasts, piquing curiosity, touching the imagination, that is really interesting to a philosopher. What a fine thing his address on Robert Shaw was! While men admired Professor James's eloquent academic address in Music Hall, we vibrated body and soul to the splendid and loyal comradeship which testified so simply, straight from the heart, to his friend's heroic life and death, in Sanders Theatre.

Who would have predicted from a superficial knowledge of the clear-headed and deep-planning banker that such a scheme as that of giving musical life to a great city should be formed in his brain, to be persistently and faithfully carried out year after year? With admirable judgment in changing conductors so that the fickle public might still find variety in permanence; in trusting the experts to carry out their own plans with almost no interference from the patron; in stimulating and exciting the public to buy so that the burden of the undertaking should be properly distributed, and that the interest which would be ephemeral in a charity might be perennial in a fashionable enthusiasm — Mr. Higginson has succeeded, not in recouping his original outlays, but in making that permanent which others have repeatedly and disastrously failed to establish.

Having only an honorary Harvard degree 1882, as he did not graduate, Colonel Higginson has been a benefactor of the University, which owes to him the Soldiers' Field, given for its athletic functions. It was characteristic of his loyal and affectionate nature that this considerable benefaction should be constituted a memorial of his friends Colonel James Savage, Jr., General Charles Russell Lowell, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, Colonel Edward B. Dalton, Lieutenant Stephen George Perkins, and Lieutenant James Jackson Lowell. It is appropriate so to make it, for the manly courage of the game may well supply to our youth the weapons for patriotic service in time of need, such as these revered, heroic sons of Harvard offered to their country. It is not all vainglorious show and passionate rivalry on that field, but an invocation is thus made to motives which may hallow the place of struggle, preparing the athlete for the battle of life, wherein he is to fight "not as one that beateth the air," but that he "may obtain," taking the very Kingdom of Heaven by force.

Henry L. Higginson was born in New York in 1834. He went abroad to study after leaving Harvard, but he was on hand when the call came in 1861, and was commissioned second lieutenant in the Second Infantry on May 28. On the eighth of July he was made first lieutenant, and was transferred to the cavalry October 31, when he was commissioned captain of the First Massachusetts, and promoted to be major March 26, 1862. He was gravely wounded at Aldie with three sabre-cuts and two pistol-shots, and discharged for disability August 9, 1864. He had been brevetted lieutenant-colonel for gallantry March 13, 1864, and had served in July on Major-General Barlow's staff, First Division of the Second Army Corps. This is a brave record, and it has left its marks upon a vigorous constitution, able, however, to endure the burden and heat of an active day after the war was over. Mr. Higginson has been for many years a partner in the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Company, and is now its active head, since Colonel Lee's age has retired him a good deal. Of the enterprise of this house, its integrity, liberality, and conservatism, a great deal might be said. Banking is still the pre-eminent Boston sphere, and State Street, even more than Wall Street, is the lender of capital for the country. In haute finance, Lee, Higginson & Company have been sound advisers, safe leaders, loyal representatives. To every good cause they have been generous givers, to some munificent patrons. The plain, old-fashioned rooms, the calm courtesy of the partners, the quiet conduct of the business, are as much of a contrast to the hectic atmosphere of the bucket-shop broker's office as can be imagined. Imperial projects have been launched in this place

Time and the Hour

Boston, Saturday, November 27, 1897

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS' JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The fifth symphony concert was given last evening at Infantry Hall. There was a good audience, but a number of vacant seats, usually filled, testified to the difficult and uncertain character of locomotion in the outer parts of the city and the suburbs. Those who were so unfortunate as to miss this concert lost one of the most interesting of the series so far—interesting both on account of the programme itself and the exceptionally superb playing of the orchestra. Mr. Alexander Siloti, the famous pianist, was the soloist for the evening, and the programme ran as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B-minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74..........Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
  I. Adagio (B-minor).
     Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
  II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
  III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
  IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
Grand Fantasia in C-major ("Wanderer"), Op. 15........................Franz Schubert
(Symphonically rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
  I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo (C-major).
  II. Adagio (C-sharp minor).
  III. Presto (A-flat major).
  IV. Allegro (C-major).
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35.............................Rimsky-Korsakoff
  I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship:
     Largo maestoso. Allegro non troppo.
  III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
     Andantino quasi allegretto.
  IV. Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sinbad's Ship:
     Allegro molto e frenetico. Vivo. Allegro.
     (First time at these concerts.)

This was what might be called a Russian programme, two of that country's chief composers being represented by characteristic compositions and the soloist also claiming that nation, so prominent a factor in the development of modern music, as his own.

The quiet symphony of Tschaikowsky is a work that grows upon one with repeated hearings. Perhaps some of its impressiveness last evening must be laid at the door of its performance, which was superior, both in point of power and finish, to either of the others to which we have listened. The orchestra fairly outdid itself in the smoothness, vigor and effective shading which it bestowed upon this great work. But the symphony itself is clearly a masterpiece, one of the few really great modern contributions to the list of classics. The sombreness of its introduction and close, the ravishing beauty of the two middle movements, the great mastery of form and orchestral technic displayed by the composer, were in evidence as never before.

The three members of Rimski-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," played for the first time in Providence, bore a family likeness to the work of Tschaikowsky in its forceful and rugged outlines, but there the resemblance ceased. There are those who consider that Rimski-Korsakoff is more truly representative of the national character in music than his brother composer. If this be true, then the real Russian is a very coarse and uncultivated person, whom it is hardly necessary to scratch in order to find the proverbial Tartar. For the characteristics of the suite are coarse and rude vigor—savage energy, indeed—but little else. There is no such grasp of musical ideas and no such convincing skill in their development as is found in the music of Tschaikowsky. The suite is frankly programme music. Its character would seem to indicate that it was a gruesome lot of tales that Scheherazade told o' nights to Schahriar. It was played with astonishing swing and power by the orchestra.

The pianist, Mr. Alexander Siloti, a pupil of Liszt, is a player with an enormous technic, which he does not use at all for mere purpose of display, but as the servant of a keen musical sense and rare power of interpretation. He seemed equally at home in cantilena, in passage work, or in the piling up of massive chords which Liszt delighted in. The unusually fine character of his performance and its appreciation by the audience was testified to by four recalls, tendered with unmistakable insistence and genuineness.

Altogether, the concert was one of exceeding interest. The sixth of the series will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 9.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1898

A COMPLAINANT CONTENT

To the Editor of the Transcript:

At last, those who stand in line at the symphony rehearsals Friday afternoons have a fair chance! In accordance with a petition signed by as many, with addresses in full, as there was room on the paper, an official was placed to keep those out who had no right to certain places. Those standing were formed into two double lines of twos and entered the gates that way. I do not think anyone entered where he did not belong. It was admirably arranged and I desire to thank the management in the name of those who sent in the petition. If the present state of affairs continues I will only say that nothing more can possibly be desired, and it is a great credit to those attending to the matter that this annoyance is broken up once for all. For if it goes once it is not to return, for no true man or woman would wish to take the place rightfully belonging to another.

CAROLINE MATHER LATHROP

Boston, Jan. 29.

"While there is Life there's Hope."

VOL. XXXI. FEB. 3, 1898. No. 790.

WHY is it that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives us so little of their most improving society? Their audiences are the very best we can furnish, both in numbers and in culture. Our pleasure is always mingled with regret that this splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country, should favor us so rarely.

Cannot we induce them to come and live with us, and go to Boston only when they feel like it?

FAMOUS PEOPLE AT HOME.

XL.

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

WHEN Mr. Dickens made his first visit to America he found a great monotony of types, which, being crude in themselves, became inordinately wearisome in the repetition of Colonel Divers, Jefferson Bricks, and Major Pawkinses. The newer civilization does not permit the development of individuality. It is the "middle grayness" of social progress. The savage aboriginal is a free man, and the fine flower of culture has variety. Nature has been enslaved from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and the commonplace result has supervened, to be followed, as time goes on, by the breaking forth of personality and individual characteristics. Here in the East two hundred and fifty years have developed them and Americans have begun to be interesting, while west of the Mississippi there are still great regions where social incubation is still taking place.

The Higginson line possesses plenty of vigor and color, and has drawn into its life influences from the whole history of New England,—the stringency of the Puritan, the loyalty of the colonist, the fervor of the patriot, the ardor of the philanthropist, the devotion of the soldier, the patriotism of the citizen. No one can have a word with Henry Lee Higginson without appreciating the variety and complications of his nature, that inheritance of the man which is an enrichment of heart and mind and manner — what is properly meant by the much-misused word "culture" as we apply it in the laboratory, correctly, instead of its artificial use for a kind of veneer. Brusque of manner, independent of speech, unassuming, everything that a manners book would ignore,—is a gentleman. A delicacy of feeling, restraint, ready perception, calm self-possession, deference given and demanded,— such are the qualities which what we call civilization has produced, which are the servants of a strong individuality and which are soon apprehended by one who has the faculty of appreciating such things. Impertinence or presumption would fare hardly with Colonel Higginson; a spade is a spade to him when the occasion for a definition arises, and he is capable of heat and passion and invective when righteous wrath is appropriate. Yet for gentle courtesy, for thoughtful kindness, for hidden generosity, for big benefactions from a right hand to which the left, with all the world, is an absolute stranger,— still more for a manly sentiment which has, on some few occasions, escaped its control and exhibited itself in romantic enthusiasm,— Mr. Higginson stands the very embodiment. It is such a man, not one who is a mere symbol for some imputed qualities through common rumor, one who is made up of apparent contrasts, piquing curiosity, touching the imagination, that is really interesting to a philosopher. What a fine thing his address on Robert Shaw was! While men admired Professor James's eloquent academic address in Music Hall, we vibrated body and soul to the splendid and loyal comradeship which testified so simply, straight from the heart, to his friend's heroic life and death, in Sanders Theatre.

Who would have predicted from a superficial knowledge of the clear-headed and deep-planning banker that such a scheme as that of giving musical life to a great city should be formed in his brain, to be persistently and faithfully carried out year after year? With admirable judgment in changing conductors so that the fickle public might still find variety in permanence; in trusting the experts to carry out their own plans with almost no interference from the patron; in stimulating and exciting the public to buy so that the burden of the undertaking should be properly distributed, and that the interest which would be ephemeral in a charity might be perennial in a fashionable enthusiasm — Mr. Higginson has succeeded, not in recouping his original outlays, but in making that permanent which others have repeatedly and disastrously failed to establish.

Having only an honorary Harvard degree 1882, as he did not graduate, Colonel Higginson has been a benefactor of the University, which owes to him the Soldiers' Field, given for its athletic functions. It was characteristic of his loyal and affectionate nature that this considerable benefaction should be constituted a memorial of his friends Colonel James Savage, Jr., General Charles Russell Lowell, Colonel Robert Gould Shaw, Colonel Edward B. Dalton, Lieutenant Stephen George Perkins, and Lieutenant James Jackson Lowell. It is appropriate so to make it, for the manly courage of the game may well supply to our youth the weapons for patriotic service in time of need, such as these revered, heroic sons of Harvard offered to their country. It is not all vainglorious show and passionate rivalry on that field, but an invocation is thus made to motives which may hallow the place of struggle, preparing the athlete for the battle of life, wherein he is to fight "not as one that beateth the air," but that he "may obtain," taking the very Kingdom of Heaven by force.

Henry L. Higginson was born in New York in 1834. He went abroad to study after leaving Harvard, but he was on hand when the call came in 1861, and was commissioned second lieutenant in the Second Infantry on May 28. On the eighth of July he was made first lieutenant, and was transferred to the cavalry October 31, when he was commissioned captain of the First Massachusetts, and promoted to be major March 26, 1862. He was gravely wounded at Aldie with three sabre-cuts and two pistol-shots, and discharged for disability August 9, 1864. He had been brevetted lieutenant-colonel for gallantry March 13, 1864, and had served in July on Major-General Barlow's staff, First Division of the Second Army Corps. This is a brave record, and it has left its marks upon a vigorous constitution, able, however, to endure the burden and heat of an active day after the war was over. Mr. Higginson has been for many years a partner in the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Company, and is now its active head, since Colonel Lee's age has retired him a good deal. Of the enterprise of this house, its integrity, liberality, and conservatism, a great deal might be said. Banking is still the pre-eminent Boston sphere, and State Street, even more than Wall Street, is the lender of capital for the country. In haute finance, Lee, Higginson & Company have been sound advisers, safe leaders, loyal representatives. To every good cause they have been generous givers, to some munificent patrons. The plain, old-fashioned rooms, the calm courtesy of the partners, the quiet conduct of the business, are as much of a contrast to the hectic atmosphere of the bucket-shop broker's office as can be imagined. Imperial projects have been launched in this place

Time and the Hour

Boston, Saturday, November 27, 1897

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.

DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The fifth symphony concert was given last evening at Infantry Hall. There was a good audience, but a number of vacant seats, usually filled, testified to the difficult and uncertain character of locomotion in the outer parts of the city and the suburbs. Those who were so unfortunate as to miss this concert lost one of the most interesting of the series so far—interesting both on account of the programme itself and the exceptionally superb playing of the orchestra. Mr. Alexander Siloti, the famous pianist, was the soloist for the evening, and the programme ran as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B-minor, "Pathetique," Op. 74..........Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky
I. Adagio (B-minor).
Allegro non troppo (B-minor).
II. Allegro con grazia (D-major).
III. Allegro molto vivace (G-major).
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso (B-minor).
Grand Fantasia in C-major ("Wanderer"), Op. 15........................Franz Schubert
(Symphonically rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra by Franz Liszt.)
I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo (C-major).
II. Adagio (C-sharp minor).
III. Presto (A-flat major).
IV. Allegro (C-major).
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," Op. 35.............................Rimsky-Korsakoff
I. The Sea and Sinbad's Ship:
Largo maestoso. Allegro non troppo.
III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess:
Andantino quasi allegretto.
IV. Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sinbad's Ship:
Allegro molto e frenetico. Vivo. Allegro.
(First time at these concerts.)

This was what might be called a Russian programme, two of that country's chief composers being represented by characteristic compositions and the soloist also claiming that nation, so prominent a factor in the development of modern music, as his own.

The quiet symphony of Tschaikowsky is a work that grows upon one with repeated hearings. Perhaps some of its impressiveness last evening must be laid at the door of its performance, which was superior, both in point of power and finish, to either of the others to which we have listened. The orchestra fairly outdid itself in the smoothness, vigor and effective shading which it bestowed upon this great work. But the symphony itself is clearly a masterpiece, one of the few really great modern contributions to the list of classics. The sombreness of its introduction and close, the ravishing beauty of the two middle movements, the great mastery of form and orchestral technic displayed by the composer, were in evidence as never before.

The three members of Rimski-Korsakoff's suite, "Scheherazade," played for the first time in Providence, bore a family likeness to the work of Tschaikowsky in its forceful and rugged outlines, but there the resemblance ceased. There are those who consider that Rimski-Korsakoff is more truly representative of the national character in music than his brother composer. If this be true, then the real Russian is a very coarse and uncultivated person, whom it is hardly necessary to scratch in order to find the proverbial Tartar. For the characteristics of the suite are coarse and rude vigor—savage energy, indeed—but little else. There is no such grasp of musical ideas and no such convincing skill in their development as is found in the music of Tschaikowsky. The suite is frankly programme music. Its character would seem to indicate that it was a gruesome lot of tales that Scheherazade told o' nights to Schahriar. It was played with astonishing swing and power by the orchestra.

The pianist, Mr. Alexander Siloti, a pupil of Liszt, is a player with an enormous technic, which he does not use at all for mere purpose of display, but as the servant of a keen musical sense and rare power of interpretation. He seemed equally at home in cantilena, in passage work, or in the piling up of massive chords which Liszt delighted in. The unusually fine character of his performance and its appreciation by the audience was testified to by four recalls, tendered with unmistakable insistence and genuineness.

Altogether, the concert was one of exceeding interest. The sixth of the series will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 9.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1898

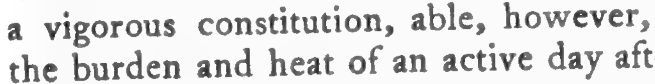
A COMPLAINANT CONTENT

To the Editor of the Transcript:

At last, those who stand in line at the symphony rehearsals Friday afternoons have a fair chance! In accordance with a petition signed by as many, with addresses in full, as there was room on the paper, an official was placed to keep those out who had no right to certain places. Those standing were formed into two double lines of twos and entered the gates that way. I do not think anyone entered where he did not belong. It was admirably arranged and I desire to thank the management in the name of those who sent in the petition. If the present state of affairs continues I will only say that nothing more can possibly be desired, and it is a great credit to those attending to the matter that this annoyance is broken up once for all. For if it goes once it is not to return, for no true man or woman would wish to take the place rightfully belonging to another.

CAROLINE MATHER LATHROP

Boston, Jan. 29.



"While there is Life there's Hope."

VOL. XXXI. FEB. 3, 1898. No. 790.

WHY is it that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives us so little of their most improving society? Their audiences are the very best we can furnish, both in numbers and in culture. Our pleasure is always mingled with regret that this splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country, should favor us so rarely.

Cannot we induce them to come and live with us, and go to Boston only when they feel like it?

PROVIDENC[illegible]RNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum,
$1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The fifth symphony concert was given last evening at Infantry Hall. There was a good audience, but a number of vacant seats, usually filled, testified to the difficult and uncertain character of locomotion in the outer parts of the city and the suburbs. Those who were so unfortunate as to miss this concert lost one of the most interesting of the series with as little fuss as the natural forces exert in their progress.

---

Colonel Higginson's city home is in the Agassiz, which we used to call the Calumet & Hecla, since it was built from the early profits of that fairy mine. Of all apartment-houses it is the most dignified, even though it be a good many years since it was built, with its fine staircase and lofty stories. The Higginsons have done a good deal of musical entertaining in their beautiful suite, which is large enough for ordinary social occasions. They have some very good pictures.

Colonel Higginson's only public duty of importance was performed on the Rapid Transit Commission of 1891. He has not the arts of the popular candidate, but in a community where the offices should really seek the man, he would have had them thrust upon him by unanimous consent. Meanwhile, as the builder of musical Boston he is applauded here by all votaries of the divine art, as Amphion was honored in Thebes.

BOOKS.

IT is gratifying to know that there is a sufficient number of persons of elegant leisure in the rapid days in which we live to warrant the publication of Mr. Henry James's subtle and refined studies of superficial things. Although they give some readers a kind of Gothic thirst for the destruction of all these fine-spun practices and expressions, and many people grow impatient or puzzled as they turn his pages, his work is undoubtedly the finest flower of refinement. It has reached its hyperexcellence in "What Maisie Knew" (Herbert S. Stone & Co.). There is scarcely a direct statement, a grammatical remark, a complete phrase, in the book, which tells its story by dialogue and a little running comment thereupon. Mr. James's most enthusiastic admirers must allow that his writings now demand quite as rigid attention as the least lucid of George Meredith's. There is almost no relief to the watchfulness which behooves us if we would not miss a point, an implication, a characteristic. Such descriptive touches as Mr. James allows himself are admirably sufficient, and make one long for a freer hand to that admirable talent which made his little sketches of travel so supremely delightful. But he evidently desires to restrain such direct and simple appeal, and to confine himself to the play of motive, the battle of mental cross-purposes, and the suggestion of epigrammatic conduct.

One must ask "Is it worth while?" and young friend L., who had gone into the Western country with a good education at the Boston Latin School to try his hand at teaching, was once called in to mark a set of history examinations. The following, he tells me, is an exact copy of an answer by a young woman (about twenty years of age, and to outward view apparently of at least ordinary ability) to the question, "Give a short account, not more than a page in length, of the Revolutionary War": —

---

The Reverliterny war broke out in 1512 between the north and the south. The principal battles was Lundy's lane, Triconderoga, Crown Point, Mamoth. The abjective points was the North were hostol and the English would not establish any traiding posts.

The whole paper was of a similar order, and the young woman received a mark of 16 per cent, which, says L., was liberal. Sometime after, meeting the county superintendent, L.

---

cidedly given — not on artistic grounds, but because we have been beguiled by the author's delicate skill from the repulsiveness of his theme — that it is indeed not worth while to devote such skill to a monstrous story; it is perverse and immoral. Delicacy of invention should harmonize with delicacy of treatment, and the bone we have to pick with Mr. James is that he has really grovelled of late in such paths, choosing, as it were, to pick his dainty way in the mud and mire. Maisie's two parents are divorced. She was to live alternately with each, but they each re-marry and then the new wife of her father and the new husband of her mother find they are affinities. Maisie's reliance is a good old governess, Mrs. Wix, who knows everything and might have enlightened her pupil in so many words. But this would not have suited Mr. James's purpose, which carries the poor child through four hundred and seventy pages of lightning-flashes, auroral displays, and will-o'-the-wisps, with never a ray of wholesome, truth-telling sunshine. Mrs. Wix and Maisie are speaking of her parents after they have gone astray. Mrs. Wix says of her mother: —

> "Who'll pay the bills?"
>
> Maisie thought. "Can't she?"
>
> "She? She has n't a penny."
>
> The child wondered. "But did n't papa?"
>
> "Leave her a fortune?" Mrs. Wix would have appeared to speak of papa as dead had she not immediately added, "Why, he lives on other women!"
>
> Oh yes, Maisie remembered. "Then can't he send?" She faltered again; even to herself it sounded queer.
>
> "Some of their money to his wife?" Mrs. Wix gave a laugh still stranger than the weird suggestion. "I dare say she'd take it!"
>
> They hurried on again; yet again, on the stairs, Maisie pulled up. "Well, if she had stopped in England!" she threw out.
>
> Mrs. Wix considered. "And he had come over instead?"
>
> "Yes, as we expected." Maisie launched her speculation. "What, then, would she have lived on?"
>
> Mrs. Wix hung fire but an instant. "On other men!" And she marched down stairs.

Among such unwholesome mazes the girl

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1898

A COMPLAINANT CONTENT

To the Editor of the Transcript:

At last, those who stand in line at the symphony rehearsals Friday afternoons have a fair chance! In accordance with a petition signed by as many, with addresses in full, as there was room on the paper, an official was placed to keep those out who had no right to certain places. Those standing were formed into two double lines of twos and entered the gates that way. I do not think anyone entered where he did not belong. It was admirably arranged and I desire to thank the management in the name of those who sent in the petition. If the present state of affairs continues I will only say that nothing more can possibly be desired, and it is a great credit to those attending to the matter that this annoyance is broken up once for all. For if it goes once it is not to return, for no true man or woman would wish to take the place rightfully belonging to another.

CAROLINE MATHER LATHROP

Boston, Jan. 29.

"While there is Life there's Hope."

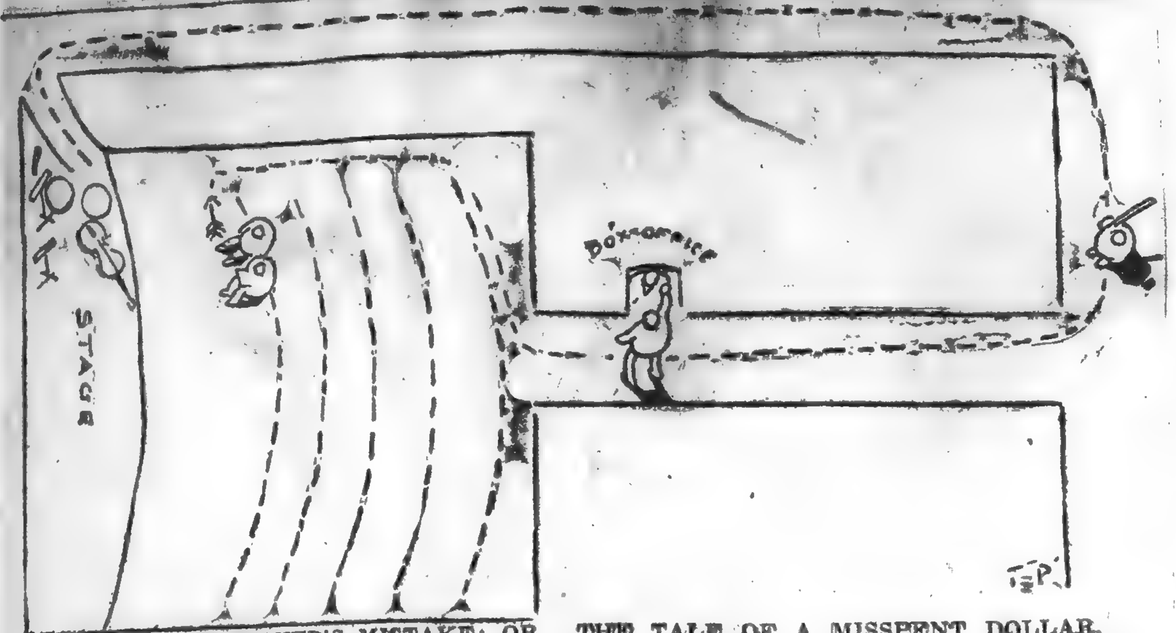
VOL. XXXI. FEB. 3, 1898. No. 790.

WHY is it that the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives us so little of their most improving society? Their audiences are the very best we can furnish, both in numbers and in culture. Our pleasure is always mingled with regret that this splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country, should favor us so rarely.

Cannot we induce them to come and live with us, and go to Boston only when they feel like it?

From Mac
Do you recognize the story?

The World
Published by the Press Publishing Company,
53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1898.



THE OBESE PLAYER'S MISTAKE; OR, THE TALE OF A MISSPENT DOLLAR.

in a New England city last week. The oboe player reported at the theatre, but having met with a temporary disability was excused from playing at the concert. The stage entrance to the theatre opened into an alleyway that led to a side street. The musician followed the street to the main thoroughfare and wandered about, sight-seeing. Meanwhile, as is customary in one-night-stand towns, the energetic billposters had covered the concert announcements with lithographs of a minstrel show to follow the next evening. The musician read the announcements in front of a theatre and concluded to drop in and see the performance for a time. He paid a dollar for a ticket and got seated just in time to see his brother musicians file out on the stage and prepare for the opening number. The oboe manipulator hurried to the box office, explained his mistake and tried to get his dollar back. The unfeeling Treasurer agreed to keep the story quiet provided the demand for the dollar was rescinded. But the joke was too good to keep.

* * *

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 6, 1898.

The Symphony sololist has been singularly devoid of names thus far into the season. Barring Mr. Kneisel, who has his London reputation to the fore, no soloist of more than local fame except Mr. Jonas has been presented, while two have as yet only established their hopeful promise rather than their actual accomplishment. Two great violinists, Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Marteau, have been completely ignored—because they are French?—and if Mr. Pugno is to be heard at the piano, no assurance is yet given of it. In the thirteenth concert, however, a stranger of eminence, Mr. Alexander Siloti, look part, playing Tschaikowsky's second concerto, which had not been heard previously at any of these concerts. This foreign gentleman—of whose very existence the notes department of the programme-book appeared to be ignorant,—pleasant of face and manner, and wearing the traits of young manhood, is an excellent pianist of the first order. Yet he is one to awake admiration rather than to start the glow of enthusiasm. He is intellectual rather than emotional; energetic rather than ardent; delicate rather than tender. There are a delightful clearness, a fine sense of proportion and an absolutely definite exposition of his purpose in all that he does. He knows how to be strong without excess and to develop a crescendo to its climax by steady and even degrees. But in all that concerto his feeling apparently never got the better of the orderly projects and distinct injunctions of his brain. It is scarcely necessary to say that his technique is genuine, unaffected, ample and particularly adequate in those difficult passages which are apt to be used as merely shows of bravura when they are mastered by the virtuoso. His performance, so modest, sure and complete, gave great satisfaction and obtained great applause to which the orchestra contributed more than a becoming share.

The programme was drawn entirely from Tschaikowsky, and the concerto was preceded by his "Pathetic" symphony and followed by the "1812" overture. Both are familiar works and were repeated with that fine sympathy and full illumination which Mr. Paur and his men have shown in them from the first. The concerto itself, composed in other times and moods and set to a different palette of tone-colors than most of the works by which its author is chiefly known, is richly melodious, resourceful in development and harmonious in scoring, while allowing full swing for the soloist in its brilliant outbursts and elaborate cadenzas.

At the next concert Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" will be the symphony, Mr. Schroeder will play Mr. Loeffler's "Fantastic" concerto for violoncello, and Smetana's poem "Vitava" will end the programme.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1898.

ALEXANDER SILOTI,

The Russian Pianist, Made His First Appearance at a Symphony Concert Last Evening in Music Hall.

The program of the 14th Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic)......Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. 2......Tschaikowsky
Overture "1812" ....Tschaikowsky

The extreme length of Tschaikowsky's second concerto was a stumbling block to pianists as well as audiences. It was played here—I understand in its original form—by Mrs. Madeline Schiller at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association in 1882. The second edition of the score is "revised and shortened according to the composer's directions by A. Siloti," and Mr. Apthrop tells us that his analysis in the program-book was written with reference to further cuts made by the pianist.

It was a great pleasure to see and hear Mr. Siloti. There is a short sketch of him in the illustrated supplement of the Journal this morning, so I shall not repeat it here. It is enough to say that as he was an intimate friend of Tschaikowsky, he plays the works of that composer with genuine authority.

His European reputation had preceded him, and yet I doubt whether those of us who were strangers to his performance had much, if any, idea of his distinguishing characteristics. He came, he played, he conquered. He triumphed gloriously.

Concerning the technic it is enough to say that it is developed to the highest degree. This technic is absolute, so that when it serves as the medium of expression, the hearer has no thought of difficulties to be overcome. It would be a tempting task to compare the technic of Siloti with that of Rosenthal and D'Albert; but what good purpose would such comparison serve? It is better to say simply that the technic of Siloti is modern and at the same time individual. You are not reminded of other pianists by him. Other pianists, similarly equipped, are perhaps more heroic; or on the other hand more sensuous; but we should remember that Mr. Siloti has been heard thus far only in a concerto that may not call for the display of heroism, or profound thought, or sensuous charm.

The chief impressions made on me last night by Mr. Siloti's superb performance were elegance and repose. His tone was peculiarly individual, and I find it hard to define the charm. There are the words "crystalline," "crisp" and the like, but Mr. Siloti's touch is something nearer and farther, as Walt Whitman puts it. The tone never offends in fortissimo; it makes its way in passages of the most extreme delicacy. Unlike certain pianists of fluency and elegance, he sings his melody, and his legato is as distinguished and apart as are his "non legato" and staccato.

I do not find him a cold player. As I have said, this concerto of Tschaikowsky is not inherently sensuous or heroic or profound. The second movement, with its solo for violin with counter figures in a solo 'cello, is at the best delightful salon music. It might easily be made sentimental. Now, Mr. Siloti played the theme with rare tenderness, and this tenderness was not feigned, it was true. The simplicity was unaffected; there was no attempt to be unduly eloquent. And the pianist who, in this movement, can suggest a mood, or inspire reverie (without falling into temptation) by ennobling the music as it were by the sweetness—a sweetness not cloying, but real and fragrant—is surely not a cold player, is surely not an animated and marvelous machine.

Here was most admirable art. And the ease, the modesty of the man! There was no attempt to startle or amaze; there was no dreamy gazing at the audience, or inspired look toward the ceiling. And I thought while he was playing that he remembered his dear, dead friend and was resolved to do him honor in a foreign city and in the presence of an alien folk.

⁂

The symphony was on the whole played with great breadth and passion. I believe that the second movement might flow more freely; perhaps it would be well to follow Richter's example and let the orchestra go its own gait; for the rigidity of a beat is out of keeping in such unusual time. And I do not think that there was sufficient grace—allegro con grazia—in this strange movement that suggests the desperate attempt of a man to be gay when at his heart he is sad. The third movement was performed with amazing fire—and to me this same third movement is indescribably great although I know it is despised by some. I admit the tinge of vulgarity and I like it. There is the whole of earthly success in this music; you hear the applauding shouts of the sweating mob. Success, as Victor Hugo said, is hideous. The irony of it all is in the dirge that follows. The answer to the shout of triumph is the death stroke of the gong in the finale. Dust and ashes!

⁂

The picturesque "1812" overture was written originally for performance in the open air. It was to have been played in the public square before the cathedral by a colossal orchestra, and the big drums were to be replaced by salvos of artillery. Why not make an experiment on Boston Common? When it is made, I hope the bells will be sounded more accurately.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 37.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Siloti Achieves Exceptional Success as Soloist.

He Is Recalled Seven Times, with as Great a Display of Warm Enthusiasm as Has Ever Been Seen at a Symphony—Master of an Extraordinary Technique.

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, was devoted wholly to compositions by Tschaikowsky, as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G major, op. 44. (First time at these Concerts.)
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812,"..........op. 49

The soloist was Mr. Alexander Siloti.

The symphony was again heard without any falling off in the profound interest and powerful impression it made when it was first given here. As before, the lofty dignity and the profound pathos of the last movement asserted itself as one of the noblest utterances that the music of our day has made.

All that can be said about the work has been said, and to dwell on it would be only to reiterate what is by this time wholly familiar. For the splendid interpretation given it by Mr. Paur, and the perfection of its performance by the orchestra, there is nothing but praise without stint.

The overture was given with tremendous fire and massiveness of effect. It is perhaps not worth much from an exacting musical standpoint, but it is a gorgeous display of tone color, a brilliant and stirring, a wonderfully skilful glorification of noise, abounding in ingenious devices, of which the final crushing out of the "Marseillaise" by the roaring tide of sound that is hurled on it is unmistakably thrilling.

The concerto has not been as great a favorite as the first with soloists here. It has been given only once, or, at the most, twice, in this city. It was first performed in this city 16 years ago. This neglect is somewhat unaccountable, as it is an admirable work, of which the interest is constantly sustained, and it affords an artist great opportunities for the display of his best powers, both of technique and of expression.

Mr. Siloti has a technique that is extraordinary, even in these days when there are so many players who are marvels in finger work. His touch is firm and musical, his scale passages are wonderful in their pearly smoothness; his octave playing is surprising in its fluent clearness.

In fact, in the technical aspect of his art, he leaves nothing to be wished for. He plays without seeming effort, even when the greatest tax is made on his skill. His style is dignified, and in all things musicianly. He has none of the affectations of mere display. His tone is full, and even when it is urged to the utmost he never abuses the instrument. His cantabile is very beautiful, as was evidenced in his playing of the andante, which was given with exquisite warmth and with indescribable refinement of taste and grace of phrasing.

In the more fiery and brilliant moments of the concerto, especially in the cadenza, the consummate ease with which he met and overcame the trying difficulties that beset his fingers was astonishing. In truth, they seemed to be the simplest things imaginable. But over and beyond these features of his playing must be placed the purity of feeling, the reserve and the refinement that characterized his performance at every stage, and that proclaimed the true artist, and the modesty of his bearing added its own charm to the general effect he produced.

His success was enormous. The applause that rewarded him was deafening in its turmoil and exciting in its fervor. He was recalled some seven times with as feverish an enthusiasm as has ever been manifested at a symphony concert. And he deserved it all.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "Gaelic," Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; Fantastic Concerto for violoncello, C. M. Loeffler; Symphonic poem, "Viltava," Smetana. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

The last issue of "Life," in writing of the Boston Symphony orchestra, says: "Why is it that the Boston Symphony orchestra gives us so little of their most improving society? Our pleasure is always mingled with regret that this splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country, should favor us so rarely. Cannot we induce them to come and live with us, and go to Boston only when they feel like it?"

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB. 6, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's program for the 14th symphony rehearsal and concert was confined to three works by the Russian composer Tschaikowsky, the "Pathetic" symphony; piano concerts No. 2 and "1812" overture. Mr Alexander Siloti was the pianist, and he played the concerto in a form changed from that of the published score, the revisions being according to the direction of the composer. M. Siloti is a Russian and a pupil of Liszt and Tschaikowsky. The concerto does not appear to be as interesting as the first one by the same composer, although this effect may have been produced by association upon the program with the grand sixth symphony and the stirring martial overture "1812."

M Siloti's interpretation was admirable as a whole, at times seemingly reaching the limit of technical skill. His octave work was smooth and very rapid; his forte and fortissimo were generally clear in tonality and his runs were accomplished with an ease and dexterity that bordered upon the marvelous. His air of repose while at the piano is remarkable, the most difficult passages in the score being played with little or no assistance from his body and his whole command of the instrument is notably good. In the cantible portions of the work his tones were not quite satisfactory, the "singing" quality lacking somewhat in sweetness. He was rapturously applauded at the conclusion of the concerto and recalled many times to the stage.

The orchestral work in the "Pathetic" symphony was apparently flawless, and the great composition was given with a dramatic effect worthy of the highest praise. This is specially true of the last movement, one of the most impressive in musical literature. The "1812" was played with the requisite theatric pomp and vigor.

Mr Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist at this week's concerto. The program will be as follows: Symphony in E minor (Gaelic), Mrs H. H. A. Beach; fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestral, C. M. Loeffler; symphonic poem, "Vitava," Smetana.

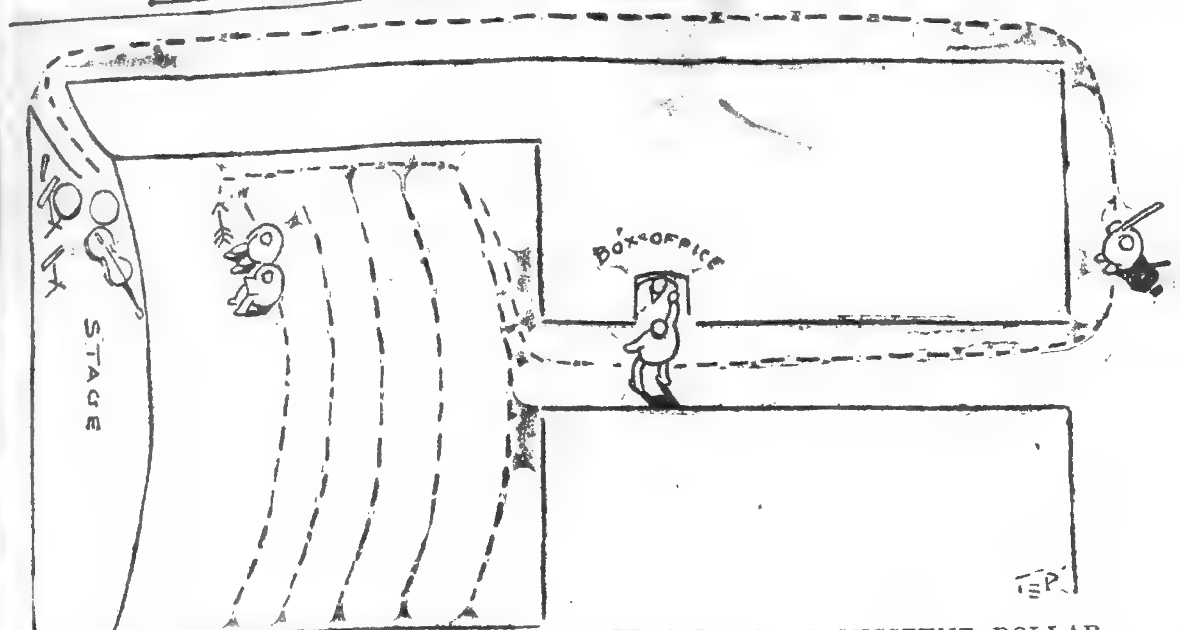
From Mac

Do you recognize the story

The World

Published by the Press Publishing Company,
53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, 1898.



THE OBESE PLAYER'S MISTAKE; OR, THE TALE OF A MISSPENT DOLLAR.

in a New England city last week. The oboe player reported at the theatre, but having met with a temporary disability was excused from playing at the concert. The stage entrance to the theatre opened into an alleyway that led to a side street. The musician followed the street to the main thoroughfare and wandered about, sight-seeing. Meanwhile, as is customary in one-night-stand towns, the energetic billposters had covered the concert announcements with lithographs of a minstrel show to follow the next evening. The musician read the announcements in front of a theatre and concluded to drop in and see the performance for a time. He paid a dollar for a ticket and got seated just in time to see his brother musicians file out on the stage and prepare for the opening number. The oboe manipulator hurried to the box office, explained his mistake and tried to get his dollar back. The unfeeling Treasurer agreed to keep the story quiet provided the demand for the dollar was rescinded. But the joke was too good to keep.

* * *

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 6, 1898.

The Symphony sololist has been singularly devoid of names thus far into the season. Barring Mr. Kneisel, who has his London reputation to the fore, no soloist of more than local fame except Mr. Jonas has been presented, while two have as yet only established their hopeful promise rather than their actual accomplishment. Two great violinists, Mr. Ysaye and Mr. Marteau, have been completely ignored—because they are French?—and if Mr. Pugno is to be heard at the piano, no assurance is yet given of it. In the thirteenth concert, however, a stranger of eminence, Mr. Alexander Siloti, look part, playing Tschaikowsky's second concerto, which had not been heard previously at any of these concerts. This foreign gentleman—of whose very existence the notes department of the programme-book appeared to be ignorant,—pleasant of face and manner, and wearing the traits of young manhood, is an excellent pianist of the first order. Yet he is one to awake admiration rather than to start the glow of enthusiasm. He is intellectual rather than emotional; energetic rather than ardent; delicate rather than tender. There are a delightful clearness, a fine sense of proportion and an absolutely definite exposition of his purpose in all that he does. He knows how to be strong without excess and to develop a crescendo to its climax by steady and even degrees. But in all that concerto his feeling apparently never got the better of the orderly projects and distinct injunctions of his brain. It is scarcely necessary to say that his technique is genuine, unaffected, ample and particularly adequate in those difficult passages which are apt to be used as merely shows of bravura when they are mastered by the virtuoso. His performance, so modest, sure and complete, gave great satisfaction and obtained great applause to which the orchestra contributed more than a becoming share.

The programme was drawn entirely from Tschaikowsky, and the concerto was preceded by his "Pathetic" symphony and followed by the "1812" overture. Both are familiar works and were repeated with that fine sympathy and full illumination which Mr. Paur and his men have shown in them from the first. The concerto itself, composed in other times and moods and set to a different palette of tone-colors than most of the works by which its author is chiefly known, is richly melodious, resourceful in development and harmonious in scoring, while allowing full swing for the soloist in its brilliant outbursts and elaborate cadenzas.

At the next concert Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" will be the symphony, Mr. Schrœder will play Mr. Loeffler's "Fantastic" concerto for violoncello, and Smetana's poem "Vitava" will end the programme.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1898.

ALEXANDER SILOTI,

The Russian Pianist, Made His First Appearance at a Symphony Concert Last Evening in Music Hall.

The program of the 14th Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony No. 6 (Pathetic)......Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. 2......Tschaikowsky
Overture "1812" ....Tschaikowsky

The extreme length of Tschaikowsky's second concerto was a stumbling block to pianists as well as audiences. It was played here—I understand in its original form—by Mrs. Madeline Schiller at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association in 1882. The second edition of the score is "revised and shortened according to the composer's directions by A. Siloti," and Mr. Apthrop tells us that his analysis in the program-book was written with reference to further cuts made by the pianist.

It was a great pleasure to see and hear Mr. Siloti. There is a short sketch of him in the illustrated supplement of the Journal this morning, so I shall not repeat it here. It is enough to say that as he was an intimate friend of Tschaikowsky, he plays the works of that composer with genuine authority.

His European reputation had preceded him, and yet I doubt whether those of us who were strangers to his performance had much, if any, idea of his distinguishing characteristics. He came, he played, he conquered. He triumphed gloriously.

Concerning the technic it is enough to say that it is developed to the highest degree. This technic is absolute, so that when it serves as the medium of expression, the hearer has no thought of difficulties to be overcome. It would be a tempting task to compare the technic of Siloti with that of Rosenthal and D'Albert; but what good purpose would such comparison serve? It is better to say simply that the technic of Siloti is modern and at the same time individual. You are not reminded of other pianists by him. Other pianists, similarly equipped, are perhaps more heroic; or on the other hand more sensuous; but we should remember that Mr. Siloti has been heard thus far only in a concerto that may not call for the display of heroism, or profound thought, or sensuous charm.

The chief impressions made on me last night by Mr. Siloti's superb performance were elegance and repose. His tone was peculiarly individual, and I find it hard to define the charm. There are the words "crystalline," "crisp" and the like, but Mr. Siloti's touch is something nearer and farther, as Walt Whitman puts it. The tone never offends in fortissimo; it makes its way in passages of the most extreme delicacy. Unlike certain pianists of fluency and elegance, he sings his melody, and his legato is as distinguished and apart as are his "non legato" and staccato.

I do not find him a cold player. As I have said, this concerto of Tschaikowsky is not inherently sensuous or heroic or profound. The second movement, with its solo for violin with counter figures in a solo 'cello, is at the best delightful salon music. It might easily be made sentimental. Now, Mr. Siloti played the theme with rare tenderness, and this tenderness was not feigned, it was true. The simplicity was unaffected; there was no attempt to be unduly eloquent. And the pianist who, in this movement, can suggest a mood, or inspire reverie (without falling into temptation) by ennobling the music as it were by the sweetness—a sweetness not cloying, but real and fragrant—is surely not a cold player, is surely not an animated and marvelous machine.

Here was most admirable art. And the ease, the modesty of the man! There was no attempt to startle or amaze; there was no dreamy gazing at the audience, or inspired look toward the ceiling. And I thought while he was playing that he remembered his dear, dead friend and was resolved to do him honor in a foreign city and in the presence of an alien folk.

⁂

The symphony was on the whole played with great breadth and passion. I believe that the second movement might flow more freely; perhaps it would be well to follow Richter's example and let the orchestra go its own gait; for the rigidity of a beat is out of keeping in such unusual time. And I do not think that there was sufficient grace—allegro con grazia—in this strange movement that suggests the desperate attempt of a man to be gay when at his heart he is sad. The third movement was performed with amazing fire—and to me this same third movement is indescribably great although I know it is despised by some. I admit the tinge of vulgarity and I like it. There is the whole of earthly success in this music; you hear the applauding shouts of the sweating mob. Success, as Victor Hugo said, is hideous. The irony of it all is in the dirge that follows. The answer to the shout of triumph is the death stroke of the gong in the finale. Dust and ashes!

⁂

The picturesque "1812" overture was written originally for performance in the open air. It was to have been played in the public square before the cathedral by a colossal orchestra, and the big drums were to be replaced by salvos of artillery. Why not make an experiment on Boston Common? When it is made, I hope the bells will be sounded more accurately.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 37.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Siloti Achieves Exceptional Success as Soloist.

He Is Recalled Seven Times, with as Great a Display of Warm Enthusiasm as Has Ever Been Seen at a Symphony—Master of an Extraordinary Technique.

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, was devoted wholly to compositions by Tschaikowsky, as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetique," op. 74
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G major, op. 44. (First time at these Concerts.)
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812,"..........op. 49

The soloist was Mr. Alexander Siloti.

The symphony was again heard without any falling off in the profound interest and powerful impression it made when it was first given here. As before, the lofty dignity and the profound pathos of the last movement asserted itself as one of the noblest utterances that the music of our day has made.

All that can be said about the work has been said, and to dwell on it would be only to reiterate what is by this time wholly familiar. For the splendid interpretation given it by Mr. Paur, and the perfection of its performance by the orchestra, there is nothing but praise without stint.

The overture was given with tremendous fire and massiveness of effect. It is perhaps not worth much from an exacting musical standpoint, but it is a gorgeous display of tone color, a brilliant and stirring, a wonderfully skilful glorification of noise, abounding in ingenious devices, of which the final crushing out of the "Marseillaise" by the roaring tide of sound that is hurled on it is unmistakably thrilling.

The concerto has not been as great a favorite as the first with soloists here. It has been given only once, or, at the most, twice, in this city. It was first performed in this city 16 years ago. This neglect is somewhat unaccountable, as it is an admirable work, of which the interest is constantly sustained, and it affords an artist great opportunities for the display of his best powers, both of technique and of expression.

Mr. Siloti has a technique that is extraordinary, even in these days when there are so many players who are marvels in finger work. His touch is firm and musical, his scale passages are wonderful in their pearly smoothness; his octave playing is surprising in its fluent clearness.

In fact, in the technical aspect of his art, he leaves nothing to be wished for. He plays without seeming effort, even when the greatest tax is made on his skill. His style is dignified, and in all things musicianly. He has none of the affectations of mere display. His tone is full, and even when it is urged to the utmost he never abuses the instrument. His cantabile is very beautiful, as was evidenced in his playing of the andante, which was given with exquisite warmth and with indescribable refinement of taste and grace of phrasing.

In the more fiery and brilliant moments of the concerto, especially in the cadenza, the consummate ease with which he met and overcame the trying difficulties that beset his fingers was astonishing. In truth, they seemed to be the simplest things imaginable. But over and beyond these features of his playing must be placed the purity of feeling, the reserve and the refinement that characterized his performance at every stage, and that proclaimed the true artist, and the modesty of his bearing added its own charm to the general effect he produced.

His success was enormous. The applause that rewarded him was deafening in its turmoil and exciting in its fervor. He was recalled some seven times with as feverish an enthusiasm as has ever been manifested at a symphony concert. And he deserved it all.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "Gaelic," Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; Fantastic Concerto for violoncello, C. M. Loeffler; Symphonic poem, "Viltava," Smetana. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

The last issue of "Life," in writing of the Boston Symphony orchestra, says: "Why is it that the Boston Symphony orchestra gives us so little of their most improving society? Our pleasure is always mingled with regret that this splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country, should favor us so rarely. Cannot we induce them to come and live with us, and go to Boston only when they feel like it?"

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 6, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's program for the 14th symphony rehearsal and concert was confined to three works by the Russian composer Tschaikowsky, the "Pathetic" symphony; piano concerts No. 2 and "1812" overture. Mr Alexander Siloti was the pianist, and he played the concerto in a form changed from that of the published score, the revisions being according to the direction of the composer. M. Siloti is a Russian and a pupil of Liszt and Tschaikowsky. The concerto does not appear to be as interesting as the first one by the same composer, although this effect may have been produced by association upon the program with the grand sixth symphony and the stirring martial overture "1812."

M Siloti's interpretation was admirable as a whole, at times seemingly reaching the limit of technical skill. His octave work was smooth and very rapid; his forte and fortissimo were generally clear in tonality and his runs were accomplished with an ease and dexterity that bordered upon the marvelous. His air of repose while at the piano is remarkable, the most difficult passages in the score being played with little or no assistance from his body and his whole command of the instrument is notably good. In the cantible portions of the work his tones were not quite satisfactory, the "singing" quality lacking somewhat in sweetness. He was rapturously applauded at the conclusion of the concerto and recalled many times to the stage.

The orchestral work in the "Pathetic" symphony was apparently flawless, and the great composition was given with a dramatic effect worthy of the highest praise. This is specially true of the last movement, one of the most impressive in musical literature. The "1812" was played with the requisite theatric pomp and vigor.

Mr Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist at this week's concerto. The program will be as follows: Symphony in E minor (Gaelic), Mrs H. H. A. Beach; fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestral, C. M. Loeffler; symphonic poem, "Vitava," Smetana.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 7, 1898.

A Tschaikowsky Programme at the Symphony Concert.

It would require a Baconian cryptogramist to discover the exact reason for giving a Tschaikowsky programme on Feb. 5. The great Russian was born in December and died in November. But, whatever the inspiring cause may have been, the result was an excellent one.

Few recent composers could bear the touchstone test of having an audience hear one of their compositions after another; a Rubinstein programme of this style led to dullness, and Brahms himself is not entirely effective when taken in allopathic and continuous doses. But the three Tschaikowsky works which formed this programme were well contrasted and showed the versatility of the great composer in a very emphatic way.

People may prate of vulgarity as much as they will, but one may suspect that this decried "vulgarity" of some of the Russian master's themes if translated into German would become "Volks-thuemlich," —"popular" in the best sense. With all the strivings of the modern Slavonic composers, the true Russian school of composition seems to the present reviewer still represented by Glinka and Tschaikowsky.

The concert began with the "Pathetic" symphony. We are glad to see that the sensational story of the composer having committed suicide, after writing this swan's song, is no longer coupled with the work; it is sufficiently remarkable that such a wonderful presentation of Sorrow and Death should have immediately preceded his own death by Asiatic cholera. As with Mozart's Requiem, the coincidence is strange and poetic enough without borrowing untrue adjuncts to embellish it.

Of the performance one cannot say too much, only the reviewer's rhapsodies would now become a thrice-told tale. But the repeated hearings have proved that the work is genuine, it is not a dazzling bit of froth, like Gounod's "Redemption," it is not less striking on its third hearing than it was at its first performance.

The ingenious 5-4 scherzo went with a freedom that speaks volumes for the orchestra and its director, and at the close of the third movement Mr. Paur received an ovation that was decidedly unusual in a symphony. If one divided Gray's great verse in halves it would give a perfect description of the meaning of the two last movements:—

> "The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power
> And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour.
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

And the glitter and sparkle of the march of the third movement, the wailing and wretchedness of the finale, were given with a well-emphasized contrast.

In this symphony one does not find the national traits which gleam in so many of Tschaikowsky's works; the march may have a touch of the Slav, but in almost every measure of the work the lesson is taught that Art needs no national boundaries, the language of emotion is the same everywhere the overture "1812," for example, is for the Russian, but the "Pathetic Symphony" is for the whole world.

Now followed a great pianist, and evidently a good musician, too, and as the interpreter always overshadows the creator upon the concert-platform, Tschaikowsky was in the background for the nonce, while Alexander Siloti occupied the foreground. A splendid artist! direct, unaffected and sincere; no passage seemed too broad for his massive power, no phrase too tender for proper shading of it.

There are many places in the first movement where the piano is pitted against almost the entire orchestra, and in these the artist was always clear without ever degenerating into noise and pounding. Shakespeare must have had some of the modern pianists in mind when he wrote:—

> "Oh, it is excellent to have a giant's strength,
> But it is tyrannous to use it like a giant."

Mr. Siloti evidently does not belong to the tyrannous ones. With the exception of a slight over-use of the damper-pedal in the first movement, there was not a fault to be found by even the hypercritical; the great octave-work in the first movement was as if Rubinstein had recrossed the Styx, and the tenderness of the second movement showed that the pianist understood the dividing line between sentiment and sentimentality.

The finale was brilliant, although in a little less degree than the opening Allegro. The furore that followed the close of the performance was something very unusual; seven times was the pianist recalled with ever-increasing plaudits. The reviewer cordially echoes the evident sentiment of the audience.

As to the work, it may be called "clavier-maessig" (well fitted to the piano), although its first movement seemed dwarfed by its juxtaposition with the threnody of the preceding symphony. The second movement, an Andante, seems the most successful, and is certainly the most poetic portion of the work. Some trio passages of violin, violoncello and piano were particularly beautiful and lost nothing in the playing. The finale seemed to touch the domain of national music and its variations of a folk-song theme were interesting.

And now came national music with a vengeance! The overture called "1812" is not suited to a symphony concert. We learn that the European powers are acting in concert in the East; let them try this overture; it will please Russia because of its subject, and China because of its clatter.

Not all things national are fit for the concert-room. A New York Fourth of July, or the Chicago convention of 1896, for example, are too strong to be handled by Music, heavenly maid. The overture, spite of some very attractive Russian tunes, soon degenerates into a whirlwind; an anemometer attached to the trombones would show the wind blowing 80 miles an hour,—a living gale.

The trouble seems to have been that some Frenchmen got into Russia and would play the Marseillaise. This happened before President Faure visited St. Petersburg and before Frenchmen and Russians began to love each other tenderly. The Marseillaise marched in on the trumpets, but was immediately surrounded by trombones; it surrendered after 20 notes had been fired. After this is tried three times to get into camp disguised but was always discovered and turned out. It never got beyond its fire line,—

"Allons, enfants de la Patrie!"

[illegible] whole Russian orchestra stamped on it and "Allons" was suddenly changed into "Furons."

Finally it came in with a full band ("ffffff") as if it had been heavily reinforced and was determined to stay, but a squadron of tubas, trombones, bass-drums, and other heavy artillery, led by Gen. Paurovitch, caught it in the rear, gave it seven distinct and emphatic kicks after which it was heard no more.

Then the Russians began to celebrate, and a man with very vague ideas of campanology started a bell theme without any reference to what the orchestra was doing. His bells were not in tune with the orchestra, but by keeping well out of time, and by the use of exceptional force, he managed to give the impression that he was right and that the orchestra was wrong.

The audience was too stunned to remonstrate and the festivity became much more discordant than the battle. Had the orchestra been in Bumstead Hall and the audience in Music Hall the overture would have been of the right degree of power.

In all seriousness, here is a work for a great national festivity; it is for out-door performance, and it allows salvos of artillery and the pealing of the heavy church bells of a city to blend with its tones; heard under proper circumstances with fitting surroundings, such a composition might excite and thrill the auditor, even though it wandered in the Gilmorean bypaths of art; but to attempt this in a concert-room is very much like trying to give a barbecue in a parlor.

Louis C. Elson.

SATURDAY EVENING

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the Symphony Orchestra gave its fourteenth concert of the season in Music Hall. The program was:

Symphony, No. 6, B minor ...... Tschaikovsky
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G major .... Tschaikovsky
Ovetrure, "1812" .... Tschaikovsky
Soloist, Mr. Alexander Siloti.

The "Pathetic" symphony wears well—so well that there is a pleasant suggestion of immortality in it. The vitality of the work is due to the strength and warm sincerity of the ideas, as well as the rare manner in which they are expressed. Familiarity reveals certain characteristic tricks of manufacture, but if the diamonds are pure and lustrous, how they were polished is a matter of only secondary importance. The Tschaikovsky diamonds are of the very first water; they are polished with the very finest art, and the suggestion of alloy in the setting does not decrease their value or beauty. Surely, the second and fourth movements of this symphony are jewels of the rarest kind, the one to grace the brow of Titania when in her most serious mood, the other to sombrely glow on the black velvet drapery covering the coffin of fallen majesty. At this late day it is needless to say that a perfect interpretation of this work was given from Mr. Paur and his orchestra. It is remembered with the symphony.

Of the soloist, Mr. Siloti, there can be only one judgment—he is a master of his art, and it would be difficult to recall any pianist of to-day who is his superior. On the side of technique he is impregnable. The difficulties of the concerto were as child's play to him; but this rare skill is not all, for it is the artist that is always apparent in Mr. Siloti's playing. He has a large, dignified style; his tone is full, clear and rich, and on the fitting occasion the piano sings in the most charming way under his fingers. His playing is always manly, and he so carefully avoids all approach to morbid sentimentalism that to the uncritical he may appear cold and unyielding. He possesses, however, warmth of feeling, as well as the rarest technical skill, but it is held in reserve for the proper moment. As further evidence of Mr. Siloti's artistic taste, attention may be called to the manner in which he keeps the piano in its proper place. The star soloist was never in evidence with the restless desire to conceal with his personality the composer; the work was done surely, effectively, with a skill and dignity in which there was not a trace of ostentation. It is playing in which there is no hurry, no spasmodic emotion, no waste of energy; the effects were made wthout seeming effort, with a placidity that was conscious of its power, with a calm surety that was most convincing. The evenness of his tone in rapid passages is remarkable; there are dash and brilliancy with the utmost clearness; in the octave passages the tone curve was as even and as regular as the downward sweep of a flying bird, and the effort seemed as trifling. Mr. Siloti is a phenomenal player and a rare artist, and that he aroused his audience into wild enthusiasm is an evidence of his power and their taste, for this artist has no tricks to appeal to the popular taste. He will not stoop, and appreciation must be on his high level. The assisting work of the orchestra was of the finest quality, and the program throughout was a delight. At the next concert will be given Mrs. Beach's Gaelic Symphony, Mr. Loeffler's Fantastic Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Vitava." Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

[illegible]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought a Tchaikovsky programme; it was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74.
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G major, opus 44.
(First time at these concerts.)
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," opus 49.
Mr. Alexander Siloti was the pianist.

Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis! It was not so very long ago—about ten years, if we remember aright—that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke put two movements from a Tchaikovsky symphony upon the programme of one of the symphony concerts, opining that two movements by this "terrible" composer were as much as the public could be expected to stand; and now we have a whole Tchaikovsky programme played to a jubilant audience!

If ever there was a work that forced its poetic, transcendental side imperatively upon you, Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" is that work. To be sure, the circumstances attending its composition and first performance in Russia, its not only being the composer's swan-song, but the fact of its Adagio coming last seeming to imply that it was consciously intended to be his swan-song—all these unquestionably aid it in appealing to the listener's poetic sense. Still, the more we hear it, the more does it seem inevitable to try to explain the work through that hidden meaning which everyone is at liberty to seek for in music, which everyone will find somewhat different from that found by others. If it is really a great work—and it now certainly seems to be one—it is in one important sense different from all other great orchestral compositions on record, surely diametrically different from most poetic compositions which the world has agreed to call great. That "Lamento e Trionfo" which Liszt took as the sub-title to his "Tasso" might well stand as the motto of many a symphonic work—of Beethoven's fifth and ninth symphonies, of Brahms's C minor, of Richard Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung;" or, if not "Lamento e Trionfo," perhaps "Per aspera ad astra," or something of similar purport. But here in Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" we find just the opposite idea carried out; Shakspeare's "Despair and die!" might be its motto. "Despair and die," not without a struggle, but none the less surely, rings through it all. Psychically the work unfolds before you a gradual disintegration, a crumbling away. Despair stares you in the face from the outset, a broken-hearted yearning after the lost illusions of youth, a half-senile idealization of such illusions; in the second movement a glassy-eyed revisiting of scenes of youthful pleasure, now foisonless and vapid—for there is no sanity in that 5-4 rhythm, and paresis glares forth from its now lacking, now redundant, beat. In the third movement, a mad struggle to overcome the monster Habit, ending, like the false catastrophe in the fourth act of classic tragedies, in apparent, momentary triumph. In the Finale, destruction, ruin, the ignoble end.

We do not often allow ourselves to attempt this transcendental sort of exegesis of a purely orchestral work, being fully persuaded that this fantastic exercise of the imagination should be conducted privately, for the benefit of no one but one's self alone. But in this instance we find it forced upon us, as it were; without it we cannot explain the "Pathétique" at all; as pure music, it eludes our mental grasp. What, for instance, but some such quasi-poetic association of ideas as ours can give poignancy of expressiveness to that callow, intrinsically vulgar second theme in the first movement? What else can make the persistent nervous rasp of the 5-4 time in the second movement bearable, and enable one to stand it without turning mad one's self? What else can impart anything of tragic dignity and grandeur to the often rather ignoble caterwauling of the Finale? To us the symphony is great only as the expression of an essentially tragic idea; and, looked upon in this light, the expression seems adequate—adequate, but not more than that; we do not find it noble nor in any way idealizing; it rises to the height of the idea, but does not go beyond it. The symphony is Zolesque.

The performance last Saturday evening was superlatively fine. This symphony may be accounted one of Mr. Paur's triumphs; the performance is his, and his only. He mounted the work here, and we doubt if he has ever heard any performance of it but his own; and, allowing the orchestra all due praise for technical irrreproachableness, the glory attaching to an apparently exhaustive interpretation of the score belongs entirely to him.

The "1812" overture is as effective as ever, and begins to show something more solid than the mere effectiveness of an "occasional" composition. It, too, was admirably played; only, we think it a mistake to have the bells placed on the stage. When placed off the stage, as at the first performance of the work here, these bells were not distinctly heard, as bells; but their din added much to the dynamic force of the orchestra, swelling it to an overwhelming volume of tone. Last Saturday evening the bells were distinctly audible, as such; and their noise, instead of swelling the general volume of tone, seemed rather to quell it and make the orchestra sound weak.

Tchaikovsky's G major concerto has not been heard here since Mme. Madeline Schiller played it in 1882. Then the work was an unmitigated disappointment. About all we then knew of Tchaikovsky was his far stronger and more original B-flat minor concerto—brought out by Hans von Bülow in 1875—and this second one sounded weak and dull by comparison. We are not sure that it sounds much better now, save that there is genuine life and go in the last movement. There seems to be little of real interest in the first movement, and the second is [illegible]

But [illegible] playing would [illegible] almost [illegible] go down. We are [illegible] to call him the most astonishing pianist we have heard for years. If complete, unshakable ease in playing can save a pianist, Mr. Siloti's salvation is assured; we can remember nothing like it. It introduces a new factor into pianoforte playing, and into listening to the same; a factor to which one must get accustomed. As the late Julius Eichberg jokingly said of Mr. Charles Molé, when the latter first played here, "That perfect purity of tone is really disconcerting; I am an old-timer, and to my ears a flute, in which there is not just the least bit of 'spit-spit!' is no longer a flute," so can we say that this incomparable ease in playing the pianoforte gives one now and then a certain sense of imperturbability and nonchalance. Add to this that Mr. Siloti has absolutely no manner at all; he plays as if butter would not melt in his mouth. But somehow he holds you fast and carries you along unresisting with him; his mastery is not of the fingers only. His technique is of the sort one does not speak about; it makes light of all difficulties, and his strength is that of a giant. His tone is invariably beauty itself. He gives evidence of complete musicianship, in simplicity and straightforwardness of style he goes beyond anything we have heard. Just how deep his talent goes could not be judged from anything this particular concerto gave him to do; only, the perfection of good taste with which he strove —and almost successfully—to make that vulgar tune of the slow movement seem less vulgar, implies a good deal. But, if the concerto afforded him no opportunity for showing depth of feeling, he showed about everything else that a pianist well can show. In a word, Mr. Siloti came, was heard, and conquered. Enthusiasm was unbounded, and only Mr. Paur's firmness, resulting in a timely irruption of Mr. Sauerquell, prevented an encore.

The next programme is: Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," opus 32; C. M. Loeffler, fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestra; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava." Mr. Alwin Schroeder will the 'cellist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1898.

The fifteenth Symphony programme named but three numbers, all of which were familiar, tried and approved friends, while two represented Boston composition at its best. It opened with Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, which was so admired and honored here when it was first heard, and then won from New York criticism—never wont to find substantial worth in what originates in Boston—ample and generous praise, and the honest acknowledgment that it was a work of such complete and dignified musical art as gave no intimation of its composer's sex and needed no considerate caution or indulgence because that composer was a woman.

So securely placed was the score, that, after several performances and a period of reflection, Mrs. Beach has found no changes necessary beyond the occasional doubling of parts in some single phrase, or the addition of a few accent marks, to help a conductor to bring out more sharply some individual point. As every keen and observant hearer realized at first, the title was derived from the use of a few old Gaelic melodies (or of parts of them at any rate) in the second and third movements. It was not intended to imply that the composer had attempted to represent either the spirit of the ancient Gael or his possible notions of musical expression, but only to intimate whence came the hints upon which she ultimately told at length her own story. The new hearing, carefully and kindly directed, established but more firmly the impression created at first and added new honors to those which Mrs. Beach has won so worthily and wears so modestly. The wild sweep of the introduction and the vital massiveness of the allegro; the beautiful contrast between the plaintively swaying Siciliano and the agile vivace of the second movement; the sweet solemnity and the stormier grandeur of the lento, and the fervid splendor and swelling climaxes of the finale, were all superbly brought out. And the delicate and intricate part-writing for various obbligati instruments was all shown with the elegance of real solos. There was great applause, and Mrs. Beach had to rise and bow her acknowledgements.

Next came that strikingly independent, brilliant and engrossing "Fantastic" concerto written by Mr. Loeffler for violoncello and orchestra. More a fantasia than a concerto, in spite of its recognition of the general form and manner of the latter, his composition illustrates both its author's bold, uncommon vein of thought and strength of mood and his sharp, far-reaching insight into the nature, capacity and best traits of the instrument for which at any time he chooses to write. As before, Mr. Schroeder gave his best art to the solo part which so advantageously displayed his resources and his skill, and performed it as become one of the first of living 'cellists.

Smetana's poem "Vitava," now strenuous in enthusiasm and now glowing in color, brought the concert to a high-keyed conclusion.

This week has no concert, but for the subsequent this programme is announced. Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture; Schumann's fourth symphony, and the ballet music from Rubinstein's "Daemon," for the orchestra; an air from Handel's "Alessandro" and two songs by Mr. Foote, for Mrs. Henschel; and two light 'cello solos for Mr. Schulz.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 7, 1898.

A Tschaikowsky Programme at the Symphony Concert.

It would require a Baconian cryptogramist to discover the exact reason for giving a Tschaikowsky programme on Feb. 5. The great Russian was born in December and died in November. But, whatever the inspiring cause may have been, the result was an excellent one.

Few recent composers could bear the touchstone test of having an audience hear one of their compositions after another; a Rubinstein programme of this style led to dullness, and Brahms himself is not entirely effective when taken in allopathic and continuous doses. But the three Tschaikowsky works which formed this programme were well contrasted and showed the versatility of the great composer in a very emphatic way.

People may prate of vulgarity as much as they will, but one may suspect that this decried "vulgarity" of some of the Russian master's themes if translated into German would become "Volks-thuemlich," —"popular" in the best sense. With all the strivings of the modern Slavonic composers, the true Russian school of composition seems to the present reviewer still represented by Glinka and Tschaikowsky.

The concert began with the "Pathetic" symphony. We are glad to see that the sensational story of the composer having committed suicide, after writing this swan's song, is no longer coupled with the work; it is sufficiently remarkable that such a wonderful presentation of Sorrow and Death should have immediately preceded his own death by Asiatic cholera. As with Mozart's Requiem, the coincidence is strange and poetic enough without borrowing untrue adjuncts to embellish it.

Of the performance one cannot say too much, only the reviewer's rhapsodies would now become a thrice-told tale. But the repeated hearings have proved that the work is genuine, it is not a dazzling bit of froth, like Gounod's "Redemption," it is not less striking on its third hearing than it was at its first performance.

The ingenious 5-4 scherzo went with a freedom that speaks volumes for the orchestra and its director, and at the close of the third movement Mr. Paur received an ovation that was decidedly unusual in a symphony. If one divided Gray's great verse in halves it would give a perfect description of the meaning of the two last movements:—

> "The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power
> And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour.
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

And the glitter and sparkle of the march of the third movement, the wailing and wretchedness of the finale, were given with a well-emphasized contrast.

In this symphony one does not find the national traits which gleam in so many of Tschaikowsky's works; the march may have a touch of the Slav, but in almost every measure of the work the lesson is taught that Art needs no national boundaries, the language of emotion is the same everywhere the overture "1812," for example, is for the Russian, but the "Pathetic Symphony" is for the whole world.

Now followed a great pianist, and evidently a good musician, too, and as the interpreter always overshadows the creator upon the concert-platform, Tschaikowsky was in the background for the nonce, while Alexander Siloti occupied the foreground. A splendid artist! direct, unaffected and sincere; no passage seemed too broad for his massive power, no phrase too tender for proper shading of it.

There are many places in the first movement where the piano is pitted against almost the entire orchestra, and in these the artist was always clear without ever degenerating into noise and pounding. Shakespeare must have had some of the modern pianists in mind when he wrote:—

> "Oh, it is excellent to have a giant's strength,
> But it is tyrannous to use it like a giant."

Mr. Siloti evidently does not belong to the tyrannous ones. With the exception of a slight over-use of the damper-pedal in the first movement, there was not a fault to be found by even the hypercritical; the great octave-work in the first movement was as if Rubinstein had recrossed the Styx, and the tenderness of the second movement showed that the pianist understood the dividing line between sentiment and sentimentality.

The finale was brilliant, although in a little less degree than the opening Allegro. The furore that followed the close of the performance was something very unusual; seven times was the pianist recalled with ever-increasing plaudits. The reviewer cordially echoes the evident sentiment of the audience.

As to the work, it may be called "clavier-maessig" (well fitted to the piano), although its first movement seemed dwarfed by its juxtaposition with the threnody of the preceding symphony. The second movement, an Andante, seems the most successful, and is certainly the most poetic portion of the work. Some trio passages of violin, violoncello and piano were particularly beautiful and lost nothing in the playing. The finale seemed to touch the domain of national music and its variations of a folk-song theme were interesting.

And now came national music with a vengeance! The overture called "1812" is not suited to a symphony concert. We learn that the European powers are acting in concert in the East; let them try this overture; it will please Russia because of its subject, and China because of its clatter.

Not all things national are fit for the concert-room. A New York Fourth of July, or the Chicago convention of 1896, for example, are too strong to be handled by Music, heavenly maid. The overture, spite of some very attractive Russian tunes, soon degenerates into a whirlwind; an anemometer attached to the trombones would show the wind blowing 80 miles an hour,—a living gale.

The trouble seems to have been that some Frenchmen got into Russia and would play the Marseillaise. This happened before President Faure visited St. Petersburg and before Frenchmen and Russians began to love each other tenderly. The Marseillaise marched in on the trumpets, but was immediately surrounded by trombones; it surrendered after 20 notes had been fired. After this is tried three times to get into camp disguised but was always discovered and turned out. It never got beyond its fire line,— when—Bang! the whole Russian orchestra jumped on it and "Allons" was suddenly changed into "Fuyons."

"Allons, enfants de la Patrie,"

Finally it came in with a full band ("fffff") as if it had been heavily reinforced and was determined to stay, but a squadron of tubas, trombones, bass drums, and other heavy artillery, led by Gen. Paurovitch, caught it in the rear, gave it seven distinct and emphatic kicks after which it was heard no more.

Then the Russians began to celebrate, and a man with very vague ideas of campanology started a bell theme without any reference to what the orchestra was doing. His bells were not in tune with the orchestra, but by keeping well out of time, and by the use of exceptional force, he managed to give the impression that he was right and that the orchestra was wrong.

The audience was too stunned to remonstrate and the festivity became much more discordant than the battle. Had the orchestra been in Bumstead Hall and the audience in Music Hall the overture would have been of the right degree of power.

In all seriousness, here is a work for a great national festivity; it is for out-door performance, and it allows salvos of artillery and the pealing of the heavy church bells of a city to blend with its tones; heard under proper circumstances with fitting surroundings, such a composition might excite and thrill the auditor, even though it wandered in the Gilmorean bypaths of art; but to attempt this in a concert-room is very much like trying to give a barbecue in a parlor. Louis C. Elson.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 6.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the Symphony Orchestra gave its fourteenth concert of the season in Music Hall. The program was:

Symphony, No. 6, B minor ...... Tschaikovsky
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, G major .... Tschaikovsky
Ovetrure, "1812" .... Tschaikovsky
Soloist, Mr. Alexander Siloti.

The "Pathetic" symphony wears well—so well that there is a pleasant suggestion of immortality in it. The vitality of the work is due to the strength and warm sincerity of the ideas, as well as the rare manner in which they are expressed. Familiarity reveals certain characteristic tricks of manufacture, but if the diamonds are pure and lustrous, how they were polished is a matter of only secondary importance. The Tschaikovsky diamonds are of the very first water; they are polished with the very finest art, and the suggestion of alloy in the setting does not decrease their value or beauty. Surely, the second and fourth movements of this symphony are jewels of the rarest kind, the one to grace the brow of Titania when in her most serious mood, the other to sombrely glow on the black velvet drapery covering the coffin of fallen majesty. At this late day it is needless to say that a perfect interpretation of this work was given from Mr. Paur and his orchestra. It is remembered with the symphony.

Of the soloist, Mr. Siloti, there can be only one judgment—he is a master of his art, and it would be difficult to recall any pianist of to-day who is his superior. On the side of technique he is impregnable. The difficulties of the concerto were as child's play to him; but this rare skill is not all, for it is the artist that is always apparent in Mr. Siloti's playing. He has a large, dignified style; his tone is full, clear and rich, and on the fitting occasion the piano sings in the most charming way under his fingers. His playing is always manly, and he so carefully avoids all approach to morbid sentimentalism that to the uncritical he may appear cold and unyielding. He possesses, however, warmth of feeling, as well as the rarest technical skill, but it is held in reserve for the proper moment. As further evidence of Mr. Siloti's artistic taste, attention may be called to the manner in which he keeps the piano in its proper place. The star soloist was never in evidence with the restless desire to conceal with his personality the composer; the work was done surely, effectively, with a skill and dignity in which there was not a trace of ostentation. It is playing in which there is no hurry, no spasmodic emotion, no waste of energy; the effects were made wthout seeming effort, with a placidity that was conscious of its power, with a calm surety that was most convincing. The evenness of his tone in rapid passages is remarkable; there are dash and brilliancy with the utmost clearness; in the octave passages the tone curve was as even and as regular as the downward sweep of a flying bird, and the effort seemed as trifling. Mr. Siloti is a phenomenal player and a rare artist, and that he aroused his audience into wild enthusiasm is an evidence of his power and their taste, for this artist has no tricks to appeal to the popular taste. He will not stoop, and appreciation must be on his high level. The assisting work of the orchestra was of the finest quality, and the program throughout was a delight. At the next concert will be given Mrs. Beach's Gaelic Symphony, Mr. Loeffler's Fantastic Concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Vitava." Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloist.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 7, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought a Tchaikovsky programme; it was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," opus 74.
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in G major, opus 44.
(First time at these concerts.)
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," opus 49.
Mr. Alexander Siloti was the pianist.

Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis! It was not so very long ago—about ten years, if we remember aright—that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke put two movements from a Tchaikovsky symphony upon the programme of one of the symphony concerts, opining that two movements by this "terrible" composer were as much as the public could be expected to stand; and now we have a whole Tchaikovsky programme played to a jubilant audience!

If ever there was a work that forced its poetic, transcendental side imperatively upon you, Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" is that work. To be sure, the circumstances attending its composition and first performance in Russia, its not only being the composer's swan-song, but the fact of its Adagio coming last seeming to imply that it was consciously intended to be his swan-song—all these unquestionably aid it in appealing to the listener's poetic sense. Still, the more we hear it, the more does it seem inevitable to try to explain the work through that hidden meaning which everyone is at liberty to seek for in music, which everyone will find somewhat different from that found by others. If it is really a great work—and it now certainly seems to be one—it is in one important sense different from all other great orchestral compositions on record, surely diametrically different from most poetic compositions which the world has agreed to call great. That "Lamento e Trionfo" which Liszt took as the sub-title to his "Tasso" might well stand as the motto of many a symphonic work—of Beethoven's fifth and ninth symphonies, of Brahms's C minor, of Richard Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung;" or, if not "Lamento e Trionfo," perhaps "Per aspera ad astra," or something of similar purport. But here in Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique" we find just the opposite idea carried out; Shakspeare's "Despair and die!" might be its motto. "Despair and die," not without a struggle, but none the less surely, rings through it all. Psychically the work unfolds before you a gradual disintegration, a crumbling away. Despair stares you in the face from the outset, a broken-hearted yearning after the lost illusions of youth, a half-senile idealization of such illusions; in the second movement a glassy-eyed revisiting of scenes of youthful pleasure, now foisonless and vapid—for there is no sanity in that 5-4 rhythm, and paresis glares forth from its now lacking, now redundant, beat. In the third movement, a mad struggle to overcome the monster Habit, ending, like the false catastrophe in the fourth act of classic tragedies, in apparent, momentary triumph. In the Finale, destruction, ruin, the ignoble end.

We do not often allow ourselves to attempt this transcendental sort of exegesis of a purely orchestral work, being fully persuaded that this fantastic exercise of the imagination should be conducted privately, for the benefit of no one but one's self alone. But in this instance we find it forced upon us, as it were; without it we cannot explain the "Pathétique" at all; as pure music, it eludes our mental grasp. What, for instance, but some such quasi-poetic association of ideas as ours can give poignancy of expressiveness to that callow, intrinsically vulgar second theme in the first movement? What else can make the persistent nervous rasp of the 5-4 time in the second movement bearable, and enable one to stand it without turning mad one's self? What else can impart anything of tragic dignity and grandeur to the often rather ignoble caterwauling of the Finale? To us the symphony is great only as the expression of an essentially tragic idea; and, looked upon in this light, the expression seems adequate—adequate, but not more than that; we do not find it noble nor in any way idealizing; it rises to the height of the idea, but does not go beyond it. The symphony is Zolesque.

The performance last Saturday evening was superlatively fine. This symphony may be accounted one of Mr. Paur's triumphs; the performance is his, and his only. He mounted the work here, and we doubt if he has ever heard any performance of it but his own; and, allowing the orchestra all due praise for technical irrreproachableness, the glory attaching to an apparently exhaustive interpretation of the score belongs entirely to him.

The "1812" overture is as effective as ever, and begins to show something more solid than the mere effectiveness of an "occasional" composition. It, too, was admirably played; only, we think it a mistake to have the bells placed on the stage. When placed off the stage, as at the first performance of the work here, these bells were not distinctly heard, as bells; but their din added much to the dynamic force of the orchestra, swelling it to an overwhelming volume of tone. Last Saturday evening the bells were distinctly audible, as such; and their noise, instead of swelling the general volume of tone, seemed rather to quell it and make the orchestra sound weak.

Tchaikovsky's G major concerto has not been heard here since Mme. Madeline Schiller played it in 1882. Then the work was an unmitigated disappointment. About all we then knew of Tchaikovsky was his far stronger and more original B-flat minor concerto—brought out by Hans von Bülow in 1875—and this second one sounded weak and dull by comparison. We are not sure that it sounds much better now, save that there is genuine life and go in the last movement. There seems to be little of real interest in the first movement, and the second is downright poor stuff.

But Mr. Siloti's playing would have made almost anything go down. We are tempted to call him the most astonishing pianist we have heard for years. If complete, unshakable ease in playing can save a pianist, Mr. Siloti's salvation is assured; we can remember nothing like it. It introduces a new factor into pianoforte playing, and into listening to the same; a factor to which one must get accustomed. As the late Julius Eichberg jokingly said of Mr. Charles Molé, when the latter first played here, "That perfect purity of tone is really disconcerting; I am an old-timer, and to my ears a flute, in which there is not just the least bit of 'spit-spit!' is no longer a flute," so can we say that this incomparable ease in playing the pianoforte gives one now and then a certain sense of imperturbability and nonchalance. Add to this that Mr. Siloti has absolutely no manner at all; he plays as if butter would not melt in his mouth. But somehow he holds you fast and carries you along unresisting with him; his mastery is not of the fingers only. His technique is of the sort one does not speak about; it makes light of all difficulties, and his strength is that of a giant. His tone is invariably beauty itself. He gives evidence of complete musicianship, in simplicity and straightforwardness of style he goes beyond anything we have heard. Just how deep his talent goes could not be judged from anything this particular concerto gave him to do; only, the perfection of good taste with which he strove —and almost successfully—to make that vulgar tune of the slow movement seem less vulgar implies a good deal. But, if the concerto afforded him no opportunity for showing depth of feeling, he showed about everything else that a pianist well can show. In a word, Mr. Siloti came, was heard, and conquered. Enthusiasm was unbounded, and only Mr. Paur's firmness, resulting in a timely irruption of Mr. Sauerquell, prevented an encore.

The next programme is: Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," opus 32; C. M. Loeffler, fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestra; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava." Mr. Alwin Schroeder will the 'cellist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1898.

The fifteenth Symphony programme named but three numbers, all of which were familiar, tried and approved friends, while two represented Boston composition at its best. It opened with Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, which was so admired and honored here when it was first heard, and then won from New York criticism—never wont to find substantial worth in what originates in Boston—ample and generous praise, and the honest acknowledgment that it was a work of such complete and dignified musical art as gave no intimation of its composer's sex and needed no considerate caution or indulgence because that composer was a woman.

So securely placed was the score, that, after several performances and a period of reflection, Mrs. Beach has found no changes necessary beyond the occasional doubling of parts in some single phrase, or the addition of a few accent marks, to help a conductor to bring out more sharply some individual point. As every keen and observant hearer realized at first, the title was derived from the use of a few old Gaelic melodies (or of parts of them at any rate) in the second and third movements. It was not intended to imply that the composer had attempted to represent either the spirit of the ancient Gael or his possible notions of musical expression, but only to intimate whence came the hints upon which she ultimately told at length her own story. The new hearing, carefully and kindly directed, established but more firmly the impression created at first and added new honors to those which Mrs. Beach has won so worthily and wears so modestly. The wild sweep of the introduction and the vital massiveness of the allegro; the beautiful contrast between the plaintively swaying Siciliano and the agile vivace of the second movement; the sweet solemnity and the stormier grandeur of the lento, and the fervid splendor and swelling climaxes of the finale, were all superbly brought out. And the delicate and intricate part-writing for various obbligati instruments was all shown with the elegance of real solos. There was great applause, and Mrs. Beach had to rise and bow her acknowledgements.

Next came that strikingly independent, brilliant and engrossing "Fantastic" conce to writtea by Mr. Loeffler for violoncello and orchestra. More a fantasia than a concerto, in spite of its recognition of the general form and manner of the latter, his composition illustrates both its author's bold, uncommon vein of thought and strength of mood and his sharp, far-reaching insight into the nature, capacity and best traits of the instrument for which at any time he chooses to write. As before, Mr. Schroeder gave his best art to the solo part which so advantageously displayed his resources and his skill, and performed it as become one of the first of living 'cellists.

Smetana's poem "Vitava," now strenuous in enthusiasm and now glowing in color, brought the concert to a high-keyed conclusion.

This week has no concert, but for the subsequent this programme is announced. Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture; Schumann's fourth symphony, and the ballet music from Rubinstein's "Daemon," for the orchestra; an air from Handel's "Alessandro" and two songs by Mr. Foote, for Mrs. Henschel; and two light 'cello solos for Mr. Schulz.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1898.

The program of the Fourteenth Symphony Concert (February 6) was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, Pathetique..............Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. 2..............Tschaikowsky
Overture, 1812..............Tschaikowsky

The second concerto by Tschaikowsky was first played here—I believe in its original form—by Madeline Schiller at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association, in 1882. Mr. Apthorp said in the program-book of last night that the second edition of the score is "revised and shortened according to the composer's directions by A. Siloti," and that his own analysis was written with reference to further cuts made by Mr. Siloti.

Mr. Siloti made his first appearance in Boston last evening with great success. The concerto itself does not seem to me a work of large merit. The second movement, with a solo for violin and counter figures for a solo 'cello, is salon music of refined character. The finale is effective in a theatrical way, and the approach to triviality is blocked ingeniously by rhythmic or harmonic device. The concerto does not call upon the pianist for display of deep thought or any profound emotion; nor is there much, if any, opportunity for an exhibition of sensuous charm.

Mr. Siloti played with superb, inimitable elegance. His tone is peculiarly individual. His strength does not lead him to abuse of fortissimo, but it vivifies his pianissimo, which is marvelously distinct in its delicacy. The ease and the modesty of the player disguise his astounding technic. His legato is as distinguished as his staccato and "non legato." All of his technical equipment is musically employed. I do not find him a cold player. In this concerto the pianist should not be unduly eloquent or sentimental. Mr. Siloti showed taste and sense in recognizing the demands of the concerto and not pretending to hear demands that do not exist.

I hear that he thinks of giving a recital with a program that will include pieces by little known Russian composers. It will then be time to speak more at length about his art. It is enough to say that last night he gave the wildly enthusiastic audience rare pleasure from the beginning to the end of his performance.

*

My friend Mr. Bullard, the music critic of Time and the Hour, said in that weekly February 5: "By the way, the overture to "Gwendoline" is so exceedingly difficult as to be well-nigh unplayable, even by modern virtuoso orchestras. I do not know that it has ever been played. Perhaps the Boston Symphony Orchestra might attempt it."

My dear sir, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the overture to "Gwendoline" in Music Hall, Boston, October 24, 1896, and again November 21, of the same year.

PAUR WILL STAY.

EMIL PAUR, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will remain in that position next season, and for five years more, if he chooses, for this is only the fifth of his ten years' contract. Col. Henry L. Higginson emphatically denies all reports of negotiations pending with Weingartner or Richard Strauss or Walter Damrosch. The present season promises to be one of the most successful, artistically and financially, ever enjoyed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it must be acknowledged that the band has never played better. So welcome, Paur, for next season!

The Boston Symphony programs have been beautifully selected for the 18th and 19th inst., and it has been decided to have an intermission, which the audiences will appreciate. The soloists for the matinee will be Madame Barna and T. Adamowski. In the evening Alwin Schroeder, the magnificent 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet, will be heard.

Matinée Program, February 18.

Overture to Ruy Blas, op. 95..............Mendelssohn
Romanza for violin and orchestra in F major, op. 50..............Beethoven
Caprice for violin in A minor, op. 1..............Paganini
T. Adamowski.
Symphony No. 6, in F major, Pastoral, op. 68..Beethoven
Awakening of serene impressions on arriving in the country.
Scenes by the brookside.
Jolly gathering of country folk.
Thunder storm: tempest.
Shepherd's Song: gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm.
(Intermission.)
Songs with piano. Madame Barna—
Suite, Sylvia..............Delibes
Les Chasseuresses.
Introduction and Valse Lente.
Pizzicati to Polka.
Bacchanale.
Fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestra

Evening Program, February 19.

Prelude to Die Meistersingers..............Wagner
Fantastic concerto for violincello and orchestra (first time at these concerts.)..............Loeffler
Alwin Schroeder, soloist.
(Intermission.)
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Pathetique, op. 74..............Tschaikowsky
Symphonic poem, Vitava..............Smetana
(First time at these concerts.)

On February 17 there will be one presentation of opera at the Academy of Music, when "Tannhäuser" will be given with the same cast, scenery and orchestra as in New York.

Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 13.

The Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening by the Symphony Orchestra. The program was:

Symphony, E minor......Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra..............C. M. Loeffler
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana
Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Mrs. Beach's symphony was received with great favor, and a better acquaintance with the work only confirmed the opinion formed of it on the first hearing. It was played with fine finish and spirit by the orchestra, and the second movement being given with delightful grace and effectiveness. The least interesting portion of the work is the last movement, which is labored and dry. With the aid of the descriptive text, Smetana's symphonic poem is very entertaining, but the time passes very pleasantly in trying to fit the words to the music. At least one was enabled to get at the intentions of the composer with the least expenditure of mental labor, and if one occasionally confounded with each other the two streams that gushed forth in the shade of the Bohemian forest, there was no difficulty in recognizing the cataracts and the foaming waves tearing through the rocky chasm. Those who recognized no rivers and no rocks need not feel humiliated on this account; the block of marble contains a human figure, a fawn or a god, according to the mood of the sculptor, and we extract from music the same ideas and emotions that we put into it. If one pays no attention to the text, the music is very charming, and improves on acquaintance.

The interest of the concert centred in Mr. Schroeder, who gave a most delightfully artistic interpretation of Mr. Loeffler's fantastic concerto. It is always a rare pleasure to listen to Mr. Schroeder, for one is so certain of the technical skill and fine taste of this artist that the critical mood may be banished and all the energies reserved for full enjoyment. And on the present occasion the enjoyment was of the most satisfactory kind, and the large, noble style of Mr. Schroeder was heard at its best, particularly in the charming adagio. There was exquisite finish as well as noble dignity, passion and grace, and one forgot the skilled player in the masterful interpreter. Mr. Schroeder roused his audience to enthusiasm, and won a triumph as deserved as it was spontaneous.

The next concert will be given on the evening of February 26, with Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz as soloists.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., FEB. 12, 1898. No. 415.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth popular matinee in the Institute series at the Academy of Music next week Friday afternoon. Madame Barna, of the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, and T. Adamowski, the well-known violinist, will be the soloists. The orchestra will also appear on Saturday evening, when Alwin Schroeder will play the 'cello. Both concerts have excellent programmes and should draw large gatherings of music lovers.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII. NO. 44.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. Beach's Work Is Again Heard with Interest.

The Favorable Impression Made by It on Its First Performance Is Fully Confirmed—Siloti Given a Splendid Ovation at His Recital in Steinert Hall.

The programme for the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Symphony, E minor, "Gaelic"............Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra.............C. M. Loeffler
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau"......Smetana

The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Mrs. Beach's symphony was listened to again with interest and pleasure, and fully confirmed the favorable impression it made on its first performance here as a work of strength, imagination, high aspiring and genuine musical worth. The second movement again charmed by the graceful theme and treatment of its Siciliana and the piquancy of its vivace, and the broad and dignified sentiment of the lento again moved by its depth and sincerity of feeling. The symphony was read finely, and played with the perfection that pertains to this orchestra alone.

Mr. Loeffler's 'cello concerto, perhaps the most genial of his works, and in some regards the most appealing, by reason of its clearness and the easy readiness with which it can be followed, was reheard with hearty satisfaction. Its originality and its marked individuality cause it to stand apart from works in its kind, and the richness, brilliancy and sometimes daring, but always singularly interesting and effective, orchestration, convincingly show the composer's full mastery of that essential of his art. The adagio is abundant in poetic charm, and the other movements are refreshingly free from conventionality, and show a fluency in invention and authoritative skill in development and treatment generally that place Mr. Loeffler among the justly notable musicians of the day.

Mr. Schroeder's performance of the solo part was exquisite in its finish, in the beauty of its technique, the elegance of its style and its wide and artistic sweep of feeling. Exacting, indeed, would be the composer who should look for a more able interpreter than is M. Schroeder, or a more thorough master of his instrument. His reception was very cordial, and his playing of the concerto met with its due reward in the enthusiasm with which he was applauded and recalled some three or four times.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; recitative and air from Handel's "Alessandro"; violoncello solos by Goltermann and Popper; Schumann's symphony, in D-minor, No. 4; two songs by Arthur Foote, and selections from the ballet music of Rubenstein's "Der Daemon." Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schultz are to be the soloists.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, FEB. 13,

Interesting Program at the Symphony Concert.

The Symphony concerts of last week were specially interesting to Bostonians by reason of Mr Paur's selection of works by two local musicians for representation on the program, which was as follows: Mrs H. H. A. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, Mr Loeffler's concerto for cello and orchestra and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau." The cello soloist was Mr Shroeder of the Symphony orchestra. Mrs Beach's work was first played at these concerts in October, 1896, and Mr Loeffler's concerto was played here in February, 1894.

Mrs Beach has earned an enviable fame as a pianist and composer, and this symphony is the most pretentious of her many compositions. She is entitled to a high rank among American musicians, and Boston is justly proud of her works. The "Gaelic" is a scholarly writing, the orchestration is very elaborate, possibly too elaborate at times, the themes are effectively developed, and the whole writing stamps the composer as a writer of great ability. The symphony utilizes the full resources of the modern orchestra, and the instrumentation is that of a musician who understands the art of producing melodic contrasts or combinations with effective results.

The first movement is of a dainty tripping character, in which the string contingent of the orchestra displayed its wonderful "team work" by the precision of its "buzzing," which runs nearly throughout the part. The Siciliano melody of the second movement is a charming bit of music, beautifully wrought out, and the Gaelic folk songs of the third part are cleverly suggested. The songs, although lacking in rugged characteristics, are well defined. The closing movement is a noble one, showing a breadth of style and originality that brings the symphony to a stirring finale. The work of the orchestra was admirable throughout, and at the close of the performance Mrs Beach was obliged to rise from her seat and bow acknowledgments before the storm of applause ceased.

The fantastic concerto of Mr Loeffler bristles with difficulties, the composition taxing the capabilities of the instrument to the utmost and running from double and triple chords in the bass to harmonics in the upper register. Mr Schroeder played, as he always does, with a purity of tone and digital skill that eliminates all harshness from his work and deftly surmounted the many intricacies of the concerto, even in the quaint Russian theme. The composer and soloist were rapturously applauded. Smetana's symphonic poem was delightfully interpreted.

The symphony concerts will be omitted this week. Next week the soloists will be Mrs Georg Henschel and Mr Leo Schulz and the orchestral will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Dedication of the House;" Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4; Rubinstein, ballet music from "Der Daemon." Mrs Henschel will sing the recitative and air from Handel's "Alessandro," and two songs by Foote. Mr Schulz's cello solos will be Golterman's "Cantilena" and Popper's "Dance of the Sylphs."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1898.

The program of the 15th Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," op. 32..............Mrs. Beach
Fantastic Concerto for violoncello and orchestra (MS.)..............Loeffler
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"....Smetana

A second hearing of Mrs. Beach's symphony confirms the first impression: It is a very creditable work, of which the second movement is the most firmly knit and spontaneously musical; the first movement and the finale contain passages of strength and beauty; the third movement is long-winded, laboriously contrived, and at times downright dull.

To me Mr. Loeffler's 'cello concerto is the least interesting of his more important works. Neither in themes nor in treatment of them is he as striking or as entertaining as in his other compositions of long breath. Yet I acknowledge gladly the ingenuity frequently displayed, and the many successful experiments in tonal color. Mr. Schroeder showed an easy and artistic mastery of the many difficulties.

There is a melancholy interest attached to Smetana's "The Moldau." The last page of the score bears this note: "Completely deaf." This was in 1874. His infirmity obliged him to resign his position as conductor, and April 4, 1875, he gave a concert to raise money so that he might consult foreign aurists. This symphonic poem was then played for the first time. It is not a work of depth, vitality or peculiar charm. Glazounoff in his "Stenka Razine" personifies the Volga, which in his music, they say, is alive and enormous. Might not Mr. Paur be persuaded to let us hear it? It made a profound and enduring impression in Paris some years ago.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1898.

(Copyright 1898 Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist. The programme consisted of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's Symphony in E minor, C. M. Loeffler's Fantastic Concerto for 'cello, and Smetana's Symphony Poem, "The Moldau." Mrs. Beach's symphony, save in the second movement, is rather tedious. This second movement is well conceived and effectually scored, and if heard separately, would be always enjoyable. But the symphony as a whole lacks interest and spontaneity. It has a "manufactured" feeling, as it were. It was finely played and well received, as might be expected.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1898.

The program of the Fourteenth Symphony Concert (February 6) was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, Pathetique..............Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. [illegible]..............Tschaikowsky
Overture [illegible]..............Tschaikowsky

The second concerto by Tschaikowsky was first played here—I believe in its original form—by Madeline Schiller at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association, in 1882. Mr. [illegible] said in the program-book of last night that the second edition of the score is "revised and shortened according to the [illegible] directions by A. Siloti," and that [illegible] analysis was written with reference to further [illegible] made by Mr. Siloti.

Mr. [illegible] first appearance in Boston last evening [illegible] The concerto itself does not seem [illegible] merit. The second movement, with a solo for violin and counter figures for a solo 'cello, is salon music of refined character. The finale is effective in [illegible], and the approach to triviality [illegible] checked ingeniously by rhythmic or harmonic device. The composer [illegible] upon the pianist for display of deep thought or profound emotion; nor is there much, if any, opportunity for an exhibition of sensuous charm.

Mr. Siloti played with superb, inimitable elegance. His tone is [illegible]. His strength does not lead him to abate [illegible] but it vivifies his pianissimo, which is [illegible] distinct in its delicacy. The ease and [illegible] of the player disguise his astounding technic. His [illegible] as distinguished as his staccato and "non legato" [illegible] of his technical equipment is musically [illegible] I do not deem him a cold player. In this concerto the pianist [illegible] be unduly eloquent or sentimental. Siloti [illegible] taste and sense in recognizing the [illegible] concerto and not pretending to hear [illegible] exist.

I hear that he [illegible] giving a recital with a program that will include pieces by little known Russian composers. It will then be time to speak more at length about his [illegible] is [illegible] to say that last night he gave the wildly enthusiastic audience rare pleasure from the beginning [illegible] his performance.

My friend Mr. [illegible], the music critic of Time and the Hour, said [illegible] February 5: "By the way, the overture to "[illegible]" [illegible] exceedingly difficult as to be well-nigh [illegible] by modern virtuoso orchestras. I do not know that it has ever been played. Perhaps the Boston Symphony Orchestra might attempt it."

My dear sir, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played [illegible] overture to "[illegible]" in Music Hall, Boston, October 24, 1896, and again November 21, of the same year.

PAUR WILL STAY.

EMIL PAUR, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will remain in that position [illegible] season, and for five years more, if he chooses, for this is only the fifth of his ten years' [illegible]. Henry L. Higginson emphatically denies all reports of negotiations pending with Weingartner or Richard Strauss or Walter Damrosch. The present season promises to be one of the most successful, artistically and financially, ever enjoyed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it must be acknowledged that the band has never played better. So welcome, Paur, for next season!

The Boston Symphony programs have been beautifully selected for the 18th and 19th inst., and it has been decided to have an intermission, which the audiences will appreciate. The soloists for the matinee will be Madame Barna and T. Adamowski. [illegible] evening Alwin Schroeder, the magnificent [illegible] the Kneisel Quartet, will be heard.

Matinee [illegible] February 18.

Overture to Ruy [illegible]..............Mendelssohn
Romanza for violin and orchestra, in F major, op. 50..............Beethoven
Caprice for violin [illegible] op. 1..............Paganini
T. Adamowski.
Symphony No. 6. Pastoral, op. 68..Beethoven
Awakening of [illegible] impressions on arriving in the country.
Scenes by the brookside.
Jolly gathering of country folk.
Thunder storm: tempest.
Shepherd's Song: gladsome and thankful feelings after the storm.
(Intermission.)
Songs with piano. Madame Barna—
Suite, Sylvia..............Delibes
Les Chasseresses.
Introduction and Valse Lente.
Pizzicati to Polka.
Bacchanale.
Fantastic concerto for violoncello and orchestra

Evening Program, February 19.

Prelude to Die Meistersingers..............Wagner
Fantastic concerto for violincello and orchestra (first time at these concerts.)..............Loeffler
Alwin Schroeder, soloist.
(Intermission.)
Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Pathetique, op. 74..............Tschaikowsky
Symphonic poem, Vitava..............Smetana
(First time at these concerts.)

On February 17 there will be one presentation of opera at the Academy of Music, when "Tannhäuser" will be given with the same cast, scenery and orchestra as in New York.

Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 13.

The Symphony Concert.

The fifteenth concert of the season was given in Music Hall last evening by the Symphony Orchestra. The program was:

Symphony, E minor......Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra..........................C. M. Loeffler
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana
Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Mrs. Beach's symphony was received with great favor, and a better acquaintance with the work only confirmed the opinion formed of it on the first hearing. It was played with fine finish and spirit by the orchestra, and the second movement being given with delightful grace and effectiveness. The least interesting portion of the work is the last movement, which is labored and dry. With the aid of the descriptive text, Smetana's symphonic poem is very entertaining, but the time passes very pleasantly in trying to fit the words to the music. At least one was enabled to get at the intentions of the composer with the least expenditure of mental labor, and if one occasionally confounded with each other the two streams that gushed forth in the shade of the Bohemian forest, there was no difficulty in recognizing the cataracts and the foaming waves tearing through the rocky chasm. Those who recognized no rivers and no rocks need not feel humiliated on this account; the block of marble contains a human figure, a fawn or a god, according to the mood of the sculptor, and we extract from music the same ideas and emotions that we put into it. If one pays no attention to the text, the music is very charming, and improves on acquaintance.

The interest of the concert centred in Mr. Schroeder, who gave a most delightfully artistic interpretation of Mr. Loeffler's fantastic concerto. It is always a rare pleasure to listen to Mr. Schroeder, for one is so certain of the technical skill and fine taste of this artist that the critical mood may be banished and all the energies reserved for full enjoyment. And on the present occasion the enjoyment was of the most satisfactory kind, and the large, noble style of Mr. Schroeder was heard at its best, particularly in the charming adagio. There was exquisite finish as well as noble dignity, passion and grace, and one forgot the skilled player in the masterful interpreter. Mr. Schroeder roused his audience to enthusiasm, and won a triumph as deserved as it was spontaneous.

The next concert will be given on the evening of February 26, with Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz as soloists.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., FEB. 12, 1898. No. 415.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth popular matinee in the Institute series at the Academy of Music next week Friday afternoon. Madame Barna, of the Damrosch-Ellis Opera Company, and T. Adamowski, the well-known violinist, will be the soloists. The orchestra will also appear on Saturday evening, when Alwin Schroeder will play the 'cello. Both concerts have excellent programmes and should draw large gatherings of music lovers.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 44.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mrs. Beach's Work Is Again Heard with Interest.

The Favorable Impression Made by It on Its First Performance Is Fully Confirmed—Siloti Given a Splendid Ovation at His Recital in Steinert Hall.

The programme for the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Symphony, E minor, "Gaelic"........... Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra. C. M. Loeffler
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau"......Smetana

The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Mrs. Beach's symphony was listened to again with interest and pleasure, and fully confirmed the favorable impression it made on its first performance here as a work of strength, imagination, high aspiring and genuine musical worth. The second movement again charmed by the graceful theme and treatment of its Siciliana and the piquancy of its vivace, and the broad and dignified sentiment of the lento again moved by its depth and sincerity of feeling. The symphony was read finely, and played with the perfection that pertains to this orchestra alone.

Mr. Loeffler's 'cello concerto, perhaps the most genial of his works, and in some regards the most appealing, by reason of its clearness and the easy readiness with which it can be followed, was reheard with hearty satisfaction. Its originality and its marked individuality cause it to stand apart from works in its kind, and the richness, brilliancy and sometimes daring, but always singularly interesting and effective, orchestration, convincingly show the composer's full mastery of that essential of his art. The adagio is abundant in poetic charm, and the other movements are refreshingly free from conventionality, and show a fluency in invention and authoritative skill in development and treatment generally that place Mr. Loeffler among the justly notable musicians of the day.

Mr. Schroeder's performance of the solo part was exquisite in its finish, in the beauty of its technique, the elegance of its style and its wide and artistic sweep of feeling. Exacting, indeed, would be the composer who should look for a more able interpreter than is M. Schroeder, or a more thorough master of his instrument. His reception was very cordial, and his playing of the concerto met with its due reward in the enthusiasm with which he was applauded and recalled some three or four times.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; recitative and air from Handel's "Alessandro"; violoncello solos by Goltermann and Popper; Schumann's symphony, in D-minor, No. 4; two songs by Arthur Foote, and selections from the ballet music of Rubenstein's "Der Daemon." Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schultz are to be the soloists.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 13, 1898.

Interesting Program at the Symphony Concert.

The Symphony concerts of last wee[k] were specially interesting to Bostonian[s] by reason of Mr Paur's selection o[f] works by two local musicians for repre[-] sentation on the program, which was a[s] follows: Mrs H. H. A. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, Mr Loeffler's concerto fo[r] cello and orchestra and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau." The cell[o] soloist was Mr Shroeder of the Symphony orchestra. Mrs Beach's work was first played at these concerts in October, 1896, and Mr Loeffler's concerto was played here in February, 1894.

Mrs Beach has earned an enviable fame as a pianist and composer, and this symphony is the most pretentious of her many compositions. She is entitled to a high rank among American musicians, and Boston is justly proud of her works. The "Gaelic" is a scholarly writing, the orchestration is very elaborate, possibly too elaborate at times, the themes are effectively developed, and the whole writing stamps the composer as a writer of great ability. The symphony utilizes the full resources of the modern orchestra, and the instrumentation is that of a musician who understands the art of producing melodic contrasts or combinations with effective results.

The first movement is of a dainty tripping character, in which the string contingent of the orchestra displayed its wonderful "team work" by the precision of its "buzzing," which runs nearly throughout the part. The Siciliano melody of the second movement is a charming bit of music, beautifully wrought out, and the Gaelic folk songs of the third part are cleverly suggested. The songs, althought lacking in rugged characteristics, are well defined. The closing movement is a noble one, showing a breadth of style and originality that brings the symphony to a stirring finale. The work of the orchestra was admirable throughout, and at the close of the performance Mrs Beach was obliged to rise from her seat and bow acknowledgments before the storm of applause ceased.

The fantastic concerto of Mr Loeffler bristles with difficulties, the composition taxing the capabilities of the instrument to the utmost and running from double and triple chords in the bass to harmonics in the upper register. Mr Schroeder played, as he always does, with a purity of tone and digital skill that eliminates all harshness from his work and deftly surmounted the many intricacies of the concerto, even in the quaint Russian theme. The composer and soloist were rapturously applauded. Smetana's symphonic poem was delightfully interpreted.

The symphony concerts will be omitted this week. Next week the soloists will be Mrs Georg Henschel and Mr Leo Schulz and the orchestral will be as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Dedication of the House;" Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4; Rubinstein, ballet music from "Der Daemon." Mrs Henschel will sing the recitative and air from Handel's "Alessandro," and two songs by Foote. Mr Schulz's cello solos will be Golterman's "Cantilena" and Popper's "Dance of the Sylphs."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1898.

The program of the 15th Symphony Concert in Music Hall last evening, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," op. 32 Mrs. Beach
Fantastic Concerto for violoncello and orchestra (MS.)..........................Loeffler
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"....Smetana

A second hearing of Mrs. Beach's symphony confirms the first impression: It is a very creditable work, of which the second movement is the most firmly knit and spontaneously musical; the first movement and the finale contain passages of strength and beauty; the third movement is long-winded, laboriously contrived, and at times downright dull.

To me Mr. Loeffler's 'cello concerto is the least interesting of his more important works. Neither in themes nor in treatment of them is he as striking or as entertaining as in his other compositions of long breath. Yet I acknowledge gladly the ingenuity frequently displayed, and the many successful experiments in tonal color. Mr. Schroeder showed an easy and artistic mastery of the many difficulties.

There is a melancholy interest attached to Smetana's "The Moldau." The last page of the score bears this note: "Completely deaf." This was in 1874. His infirmity obliged him to resign his position as conductor, and April 4, 1875, he gave a concert to raise money so that he might consult foreign aurists. This symphonic poem was then played for the first time. It is not a work of depth, vitality or peculiar charm. Glazounoff in his "Stenka Razine" personifies the Volga, which in his music, they say, is alive and enormous. Might not Mr. Paur be persuaded to let us hear it? It made a profound and enduring impression in Paris some years ago.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 13, 1898.
(Copyright 1898 Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist. The programme consisted of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's Symphony in E minor, C. M. Loeffler's Fantastic Concerto for 'cello, and Smetana's Symphony Poem, "The Moldau." Mrs. Beach's symphony, save in the second movement, is rather tedious. This second movement is well conceived and effectually scored, and if heard separately, would be always enjoyable. But the symphony as a whole lacks interest and spontaneity. It has a "manufactured" feeling, as it were. It was finely played and well received, as might be expected.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 14, 1898.

A Cosmopolitan Program at the Symphony Concert.

It was a cosmopolitan programme that was presented on Saturday night, for Gael, Russian and Bohemian were responsible for the themes, but the Russian was Germanized and the Gael had taken out American naturalization papers.

Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony was heard for the second time at these concerts. This reiteration did not in any degree change the impression made by the first performance, given at the beginning of last season. One still wishes that the talented composer had given us an orchestral suite rather than a symphony, for there are moments when the heaviness of the burden of this developed form seems to tell upon the composer, as in the extended treatment of the slow movement, for example.

A second hearing revealed rather more of the Gaelic spirit than was discovered in the first performance; something of Scottish lilt and of Gaelic melancholy are present, but not treated with the directness and folk-music style of a Mendelssohn. Yet the Scherzo (what a glorious Gaelic flavor there is in the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony!) is a most charming movement, if we do not seek too closely for a folk-song style to justify the title.

This movement, with clear shape and unstrained melody, evoked the chief applause of the symphony, and is decidedly the best part of the whole work. The opening allegro of the symphony, although in good form, is not a very definite affair, and its themes do not fasten themselves upon the mind clearly. There is not enough of marked contrast, nor are the figures suitable to characteristic development.

The long, slow movement proved that the Gaels were a very deceptive race as regards their cadences, but it had some moments of great beauty, which, however, were not made stronger by repetitions with altered harmonies and modulations. The striking passages of bass clarinette were an example of bold, but not altogether successful scoring.

Mrs Beach, in this, and in other works, has proved her right to be considered the chief female composer of America, but there is no necessity for her to constantly use the largest form of composition to demonstrate this. In the lesser forms she would be greater.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Violoncello concerto is finely adapted to its instrument, and it shows the skill of scoring which is characteristic of every recent work by this composer. It received a performance by Mr. Alwin Schroeder that must have gladdened the composer's heart; surety of intonation, breadth of tone, improvisational freedom and tender expression were in the performance, and it was no wonder that recall followed recall at the close, a triumph in which Mr. Schroeder forced Mr. Loeffler to participate. Mr. Schroeder also received a wreath of that vegetable of glory—the laurel—bound with the German colors.

The cadenza work was brilliant in the extreme, even the harmonics, which are not often reliable upon the violoncello, being clear as crystal. The free fantasie style of the work does not altogether appeal to the reviewer; we have too much of freedom in our modern music; composers are beginning to regard form as if it were an absolute fetter. Form is only contrast reduced to law, and one can have as much variety within the accepted forms as outside of them; there is no perceptible monotony in the human face, for example, yet all faces have the same relationship of parts.

We enjoyed the Russian theme and its treatment best of all the long work. This theme is as wild and rollicking as a Kamarinskaia, the kicking men's dance of Russia. It may have been Caviare to the general, but its dashing treatment made it exciting to all.

If Tschaikowsky named his musical picture of the Holy War "1812," this frisky modern setting of Russian enjoyments is modern enough to be entitled "1898". And it is pleasant to find that Mr. Loeffler is not always sorrowful; in this work the composer emerges from his dank and mouldering gloom and actually smiles! It is healthier music than ghoul-like serenades, carnivals of skeletons, and children who die very lingering deaths on the viol d'amour.

With a bit of Bohemian national music by Smetana, the programme ended. "Vltava" was the closing number. "Vltava" is not a patent medicine, but the Bohemian name for the river Moldau, if we are not mistaken. The river aforesaid flows on with a steadiness only excelled by the flow of the Rhine as given in Wagner's aqueous music. But Smetana wreaths the glory of his native land around his river.

To the present writer there is always something thrilling or exalting in Smetana's orchestral pictures; a man thoroughly in earnest is bound to make an impression on all but the radically superficial; and Smetana was deeply in earnest, for he was laboring for a re-establishment of Bohemian art, prostrate ever since the 30 year's war; he was a pioneer, and though fate showered every sorrow down upon him, death of loved ones, deafness, finally madness, his pure gold was refined in the

Most wretched men are cradled into poetry by wrong,
They learn in suffering what they teach in song."

Smetana's personal sorrows and the wrongs of his country have made his genius the stronger. Dvorak has become in some degree Teutonized. Bohemian music has as yet, therefore, but the one great standard-bearer—Bedrich Smetana.

The strong contrasts of the work, the pensive and the warlike themes, the wedding and the hunting music, were excellently brought out by the orchestra, and the climaxes were grandly worked up by Mr. Paur's interpretation. It was a good culmination and the orchestra played it as if they enjoyed it.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach: Symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," opus 32.
C. M. Loeffler: Fantastic Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra (MS.)
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vitava."
Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Mrs. Beach's symphony improves mightily upon better acquaintance; and a work that does this is a work worth talking about. When it was brought out last season we heard (we believe) all the rehearsals, as well as the public performance; and still we had our doubts of the composition, especially of certain points in the scoring. Many places sounded unclear, merely tentative. But last Saturday evening the work made a far different impression upon us. Save that in that place in the finale where all the strings unite in unison upon the second theme, the effect still seems less strong than it looks in the score, we could find none of the weak points that struck us at the first hearings. Whether Mrs. Beach has in any way modified her scoring since the performance last season, or that the fault was wholly our own, we do not know.

As the symphony sounds now, it seems to us an admirable work, full of both musical force and poetry. The themes show true invention, the development and working-out are carried through with an unusually firm hand, and show both skill and rare fertility of musical resource. In short, it is a work which well deserves repeated performance on its own merits, and not merely for the sake of a clearer understanding. There are some compositions which one wishes to hear again, to see if one cannot at last make something out of them; others which one wishes to hear again because it is pleasant to hear them. Mrs. Beach's symphony now belongs distinctly to the latter class. It has earned a place in the repertory.

If we are to have 'cello concertos at all, commend us to Mr. Loeffler's "Fantastic." The world of music moves; and we may say without offence that it has been moving away from 'cello concertos for the last several decades, having got far enough from them by this time. But this one of Mr. Loeffler's goes far toward removing the curse from the genus. With a keenness and sureness of insight that almost amount to genius, Mr. Loeffler has sized up the musical situation and written the first composition we have ever heard that deserves to be called a modern 'cello concerto. It was almost like creating a white blackbird! Just think of the difficulty of the task! A 'cello concerto must contain virtuoso passages for the solo instrument; no doubt such passages, like private theatricals, exist solely for the benefit of the performer; but they must be there all the same, else the thing is no concerto. See how Mr. Loeffler gets out of the dilemma. He finds two ways out of it, either of which he takes, as happens to suit his fancy. One is this: just before that virtuoso "crabble-crabble" gets to the point of making the listening worm turn, he flies off to something else, to some delicious bit of cantilena or some resounding tutti. Here is the other way: seeing well that this same "crabble-crabble" has a strong humorous side, he treats the whole passage humorously; you see his sardonic grin gleaming out from the wood-wind, and the orchestra titters sarcastically! That is what you call being a man of resource. Yes, we stick to it: this "Fantastic" of Mr. Loeffler's is the only composition we know for 'cello and orchestra—that is the only one in an extended form—which maintains any musical reason of being today. Did we say the only one? Well, we repeat it. The thing itself, apart from the wonderfully skilful treatment of the solo instrument, is full of imaginative beauty; it sounds better now even than it did four years ago. Mr. Schroeder played it in a way to confound praise; it was masterly playing from beginning to end, full of every good and fine quality. The audience felt it, too, and both 'cellist and composer were repeatedly recalled at the end.

Smetana's "Vltava" is agreeable, apparantly well written music. More can hardly be said of it. If orchestras played in drawing-rooms we should call it first-rate salon music. Had it not just as well be laid on the shelf now? It was admirably played.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Feb. 25, and Saturday evening, Feb. 26 (there will be no concert nor rehearsal this week)—is: Beethoven, overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses," opus 124; Handel, recitative and aria from "Alessandro;" Goltermann, cantilena for violoncello; Popper, "Dance of Sylphs" for ditto; Foote, Elaine's song, "Sweet is True Love," and Irish folk-song; Rubinstein, ballet-music from "Der Dämon." Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the singer, and Mr. Leo Schulz the 'cellist.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

A Cosmopolitan Program at the Symphony Concert.

It was a cosmopolitan programme that was presented on Saturday night, for Gael, Russian and Bohemian were responsible for the themes, but the Russian was Germanized and the Gael had taken out American naturalization papers.

Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony was heard for the second time at these concerts. This reiteration did not in any degree change the impression made by the first performance, given at the beginning of last season. One still wishes that the talented composer had given us an orchestral suite rather than a symphony, for there are moments when the heaviness of the burden of this developed form seems to tell upon the composer, as in the extended treatment of the slow movement, for example.

A second hearing revealed rather more of the Gaelic spirit than was discovered in the first performance; something of Scottish lilt and of Gaelic melancholy are present, but not treated with the directness and folk-music style of a Mendelssohn. Yet the Scherzo (what a glorious Gaelic flavor there is in the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony!) is a most charming movement, if we do not seek too closely for a folk-song style to justify the title.

This movement, with clear shape and unstrained melody, evoked the chief applause of the symphony, and is decidedly the best part of the whole work. The opening allegro of the symphony, although in good form, is not a very definite affair, and its themes do not fasten themselves upon the mind clearly. There is not enough of marked contrast, nor are the figures suitable to characteristic development.

The long, slow movement proved that the Gaels were a very deceptive race as regards their cadences, but it had some moments of great beauty, which, however, were not made stronger by repetitions with altered harmonies and modulations. The striking passages of bass clarinette were an example of bold, but not altogether successful scoring.

Mrs Beach, in this, and in other works, has proved her right to be considered the chief female composer of America, but there is no necessity for her to constantly use the largest form of composition to demonstrate this. In the lesser forms she would be greater.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Violoncello concerto is finely adapted to its instrument, and it shows the skill of scoring which is characteristic of every recent work by this composer. It received a performance by Mr. Alwin Schroeder that must have gladdened the composer's heart; surety of intonation, breadth of tone, improvisational freedom and tender expression were in the performance, and it was no wonder that recall followed recall at the close, a triumph in which Mr. Schroeder forced Mr. Loeffler to participate. Mr. Schroeder also received a wreath of that vegetable of glory—the laurel—bound with the German colors.

The cadenza work was brilliant in the extreme, even the harmonics, which are not often reliable upon the violoncello, being clear as crystal. The free fantasie style of the work does not altogether appeal to the reviewer; we have too much of freedom in our modern music; composers are beginning to regard form as if it were an absolute fetter. Form is only contrast reduced to law, and one can have as much variety within the accepted forms as outside of them; there is no perceptible monotony in the human face, for example, yet all faces have the same relationship of parts.

We enjoyed the Russian theme and its treatment best of all the long work. This theme is as wild and rollicking as a Kamarinskaia, the kicking men's dance of Russia. It may have been Caviare to the general, but its dashing treatment made it exciting to all.

If Tschaikowsky named his musical picture of the Holy War "1812," this frisky modern setting of Russian enjoyments is modern enough to be entitled "1898". And it is pleasant to find that Mr. Loeffler is not always sorrowful; in this work the composer emerges from his dank and mouldering gloom and actually smiles! It is healthier music than ghoul-like serenades, carnivals of skeletons, and children who die very lingering deaths on the viol d'amour.

With a bit of Bohemian national music by Smetana, the programme ended. "Vltava" was the closing number. "Vltava" is not a patent medicine, but the Bohemian name for the river Moldau, if we are not mistaken. The river aforesaid flows on with a steadiness only excelled by the flow of the Rhine as given in Wagner's aqueous music. But Smetana wreaths the glory of his native land around his river.

To the present writer there is always something thrilling or exalting in Smetana's orchestral pictures; a man thoroughly in earnest is bound to make an impression on all but the radically superficial; and Smetana was deeply in earnest, for he was laboring for a re-establishment of Bohemian art, prostrate ever since the 30 year's war; he was a pioneer, and though fate showered every sorrow down upon him, death of loved ones, deafness, finally madness, his pure gold was refined in the furnace of affliction.

They learn in suffering what they teach in song."

Smetana's personal sorrows and the wrongs of his country have made his genius the stronger. Dvorak has become in some degree Teutonized. Bohemian music has as yet, therefore, but the one great standard-bearer—Bedrich Smetana.

The strong contrasts of the work, the pensive and the warlike themes, the wedding and the hunting music, were excellently brought out by the orchestra, and the climaxes were grandly worked up by Mr. Paur's interpretation. It was a good culmination and the orchestra played it as if they enjoyed it. Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.
Seventy-fifth year—Vol. LIII. No. 267
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Interesting Programme of Old Numbers With Mr. Alwin Schroeder as Soloist.

The programme for the 15th Symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening ws a programme of favorites. It was:

Symphony, E minor, "Gaelic"............ Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra ....C. M. Loeffler
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau"........... Smetana

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist.

The symphony loses none of its pleasing qualities on a second hearing; rather, in fact, this composition of Mrs. Beach improves as one becomes more familiar with its several numbers. The second and finale are still the most favorably received, with the second the real musical gem of the symphony.

The 'cello concerto, with that eminent 'cellist, Alwin Schroeder as soloist, could not be otherwise than interesting, and yet the work is by no means one of Mr. Loeffler's best efforts.

The Smetana selection has all the peculiarities of the composer, and even with its strange theme of sadness, possesses a certain interest, which it is somewhat difficult to explain.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; recitative and air from Handel's "Alessandro"; violoncello solos by Goltermann and Popper; Schumann's symphony, in D-minor, No. 4; two songs by Arthur Foote, and selections from the ballet music of Rubenstein's "Der Daemon." Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schultz are to be the soloists.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 12, 1898.

MRS. BEACH'S SYMPHONY.

The Symphony rehearsal and concert of this week are of particular interest to Bostonians, as the symphony itself is the work of our popular and much beloved Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. To write a really poetic and thoroughly artistic symphony is a great thing for any musician to accomplish, and an undertaking in which many have signally failed.

Mrs. Beach's reputation, however, is more thoroughly established than ever with each repetition of this beautiful Gaelic symphony. She is too thoroughly a musician and too sensitive an artist to fall short of the best, and this fact she has demonstrated in the many songs and instrumental compositions with which she has enriched the present-day musical literature; but it is in the Gaelic symphony that she rises to the greatest heights, and most thoroughly demonstrates her right to be ranked with the leading composers of the time.

The concert this evening begins promptly at eight, and Mrs. Beach's symphony comes first on the program.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 14, 1898.

A Cosmopolitan Program at the Symphony Concert.

It was a cosmopolitan programme that was presented on Saturday night, for Gael, Russian and Bohemian were responsible for the themes, but the Russian was Germanized and the Gael had taken out American naturalization papers.

Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony was heard for the second time at these concerts. This reiteration did not in any degree change the impression made by the first performance, given at the beginning of last season. One still wishes that the talented composer had given us an orchestral suite rather than a symphony, for there are moments when the heaviness of the burden of this developed form seems to tell upon the composer, as in the extended treatment of the slow movement, for example.

A second hearing revealed rather more of the Gaelic spirit than was discovered in the first performance; something of Scottish lilt and of Gaelic melancholy are present, but not treated with the directness and folk-music style of a Mendelssohn. Yet the Scherzo (what a glorious Gaelic flavor there is in the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony!) is a most charming movement, if we do not seek too closely for a folk-song style to justify the title.

This movement, with clear shape and unstrained melody, evoked the chief applause of the symphony, and is decidedly the best part of the whole work. The opening allegro of the symphony, although in good form, is not a very definite affair, and its themes do not fasten themselves upon the mind clearly. There is not enough of marked contrast, nor are the figures suitable to characteristic development.

The long, slow movement proved that the Gaels were a very deceptive race as regards their cadences, but it had some moments of great beauty, which, however, were not made stronger by repetitions with altered harmonies and modulations. The striking passages of bass clarinette were an example of bold, but not altogether successful scoring.

Mrs Beach, in this, and in other works, has proved her right to be considered the chief female composer of America, but there is no necessity for her to constantly use the largest form of composition to demonstrate this. In the lesser forms she would be greater.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Violoncello concerto is finely adapted to its instrument, and it shows the skill of scoring which is characteristic of every recent work by this composer. It received a performance by Mr. Alwin Schroeder that must have gladdened the composer's heart; surety of intonation, breadth of tone, improvisational freedom and tender expression were in the performance, and it was no wonder that recall followed recall at the close, a triumph in which Mr. Schroeder forced Mr. Loeffler to participate. Mr. Schroeder also received a wreath of that vegetable of glory—the laurel—bound with the German colors.

The cadenza work was brilliant in the extreme, even the harmonics, which are not often reliable upon the violoncello, being clear as crystal. The free fantasie style of the work does not altogether appeal to the reviewer; we have too much of freedom in our modern music; composers are beginning to regard form as if it were an absolute fetter. Form is only contrast reduced to law, and one can have as much variety within the accepted forms as outside of them; there is no perceptible monotony in the human face, for example, yet all faces have the same relationship of parts.

We enjoyed the Russian theme and its treatment best of all the long work. This theme is as wild and rollicking as a Kamarinskaia, the kicking men's dance of Russia. It may have been Caviare to the general, but its dashing treatment made it exciting to all.

If Tschaikowsky named his musical picture of the Holy War "1812," this frisky modern setting of Russian enjoyments is modern enough to be entitled "1898". And it is pleasant to find that Mr. Loeffler is not always sorrowful; in this work the composer emerges from his dank and mouldering gloom and actually smiles! It is healthier music than ghoul-like serenades, carnivals of skeletons, and children who die very lingering deaths on the viol d'amour.

With a bit of Bohemian national music by Smetana, the programme ended. "Vltava" was the closing number. "Vltava" is not a patent medicine, but the Bohemian name for the river Moldau, if we are not mistaken. The river aforesaid flows on with a steadiness only excelled by the flow of the Rhine as given in Wagner's aqueous music. But Smetana wreaths the glory of his native land around his river.

To the present writer there is always something thrilling or exalting in Smetana's orchestral pictures; a man thoroughly in earnest is bound to make an impression on all but the radically superficial; and Smetana was deeply in earnest, for he was laboring for a re-establishment of Bohemian art, prostrate ever since the 30 year's war; he was a pioneer, and though fate showered every sorrow down upon him, death of loved ones, deafness, finally madness, his pure gold was refined in the furnace of affliction.

> "Most wretched men are cradled into poetry by wrong,
> They learn in suffering what they teach in song."

Smetana's personal sorrows and the wrongs of his country have made his genius the stronger. Dvorak has become in some degree Teutonized. Bohemian music has as yet, therefore, but the one great standard-bearer—Bedrich Smetana.

The strong contrasts of the work, the pensive and the warlike themes, the wedding and the hunting music, were excellently brought out by the orchestra, and the climaxes were grandly worked up by Mr. Paur's interpretation. It was a good culmination and the orchestra played it as if they enjoyed it.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fifteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach: Symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," opus 32.
C. M. Loeffler: Fantastic Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra (MS.)
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vltava."
Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Mrs. Beach's symphony improves mightily upon better acquaintance; and a work that does this is a work worth talking about. When it was brought out last season we heard (we believe) all the rehearsals, as well as the public performance; and still we had our doubts of the composition, especially of certain points in the scoring. Many places sounded unclear, merely tentative. But last Saturday evening the work made a far different impression upon us. Save that in that place in the finale where all the strings unite in unison upon the second theme, the effect still seems less strong than it looks in the score, we could find none of the weak points that struck us at the first hearings. Whether Mrs. Beach has in any way modified her scoring since the performance last season, or that the fault was wholly our own, we do not know.

As the symphony sounds now, it seems to us an admirable work, full of both musical force and poetry. The themes show true invention, the development and working-out are carried through with an unusually firm hand, and show both skill and rare fertility of musical resource. In short, it is a work which well deserves repeated performance on its own merits, and not merely for the sake of a clearer understanding. There are some compositions which one wishes to hear again, to see if one cannot at last make something out of them; others which one wishes to hear again because it is pleasant to hear them. Mrs. Beach's symphony now belongs distinctly to the latter class. It has earned a place in the repertory.

If we are to have 'cello concertos at all, commend us to Mr. Loeffler's "Fantastic." The world of music moves; and we may say without offence that it has been moving away from 'cello concertos for the last several decades, having got far enough from them by this time. But this one of Mr. Loeffler's goes far toward removing the curse from the genus. With a keenness and sureness of insight that almost amount to genius, Mr. Loeffler has sized up the musical situation and written the first composition we have ever heard that deserves to be called a modern 'cello concerto. It was almost like creating a white blackbird! Just think of the difficulty of the task! A 'cello concerto must contain virtuoso passages for the solo instrument; no doubt such passages, like private theatricals, exist solely for the benefit of the performer; but they must be there all the same, else the thing is no concerto. See how Mr. Loeffler gets out of the dilemma. He finds two ways out of it, either of which he takes, as happens to suit his fancy. One is this: just before that virtuoso "crabble-crabble" gets to the point of making the listening worm turn, he flies off to something else, to some delicious bit of cantilena or some resounding tutti. Here is the other way: seeing well that this same "crabble-crabble" has a strong humorous side, he treats the whole passage humorously; you see his sardonic grin gleaming out from the wood-wind, and the orchestra titters sarcastically! That is what you call being a man of resource. Yes, we stick to it: this "Fantastic" of Mr. Loeffler's is the only composition we know for 'cello and orchestra—that is the only one in an extended form—which maintains any musical reason of being today. Did we say the only one? Well, we repeat it. The thing itself, apart from the wonderfully skilful treatment of the solo instrument, is full of imaginative beauty; it sounds better now even than it did four years ago. Mr. Schroeder played it in a way to confound praise; it was masterly playing from beginning to end, full of every good and fine quality. The audience felt it, too, and both 'cellist and composer were repeatedly recalled at the end.

Smetana's "Vltava" is agreeable, apparantly well written music. More can hardly be said of it. If orchestras played in drawing-rooms we should call it first-rate salon music. Had it not just as well be laid on the shelf now? It was admirably played.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Feb. 25, and Saturday evening, Feb. 26 (there will be no concert nor rehearsal this week)—is: Beethoven, overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses," opus 124; Handel, recitative and aria from "Alessandro;" Goltermann, cantilena for violoncello; Popper, "Dance of Sylphs" for ditto; Foote, Elaine's song, "Sweet is True Love," and Irish folksong; Rubinstein, ballet-music from "Der Dämon." Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the singer, and Mr. Leo Schulz the 'cellist.

14

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

A Cosmopolitan Program at the Symphony Concert.

It was a cosmopolitan programme that was presented on Saturday night, for Gael, Russian and Bohemian were responsible for the themes, but the Russian was Germanized and the Gael had taken out American naturalization papers.

Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony was heard for the second time at these concerts. This reiteration did not in any degree change the impression made by the first performance, given at the beginning of last season. One still wishes that the talented composer had given us an orchestral suite rather than a symphony, for there are moments when the heaviness of the burden of this developed form seems to tell upon the composer, as in the extended treatment of the slow movement, for example.

A second hearing revealed rather more of the Gaelic spirit than was discovered in the first performance; something of Scottish lilt and of Gaelic melancholy are present, but not treated with the directness and folk-music style of a Mendelssohn. Yet the Scherzo (what a glorious Gaelic flavor there is in the Scherzo of Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony!) is a most charming movement, if we do not seek too closely for a folk-song style to justify the title.

This movement, with clear shape and unstrained melody, evoked the chief applause of the symphony, and is decidedly the best part of the whole work. The opening allegro of the symphony, although in good form, is not a very definite affair, and its themes do not fasten themselves upon the mind clearly. There is not enough of marked contrast, nor are the figures suitable to characteristic development.

The long, slow movement proved that the Gaels were a very deceptive race as regards their cadences, but it had some moments of great beauty, which, however, were not made stronger by repetitions with altered harmonies and modulations. The striking passages of bass clarinette were an example of bold, but not altogether successful scoring.

Mrs Beach, in this, and in other works, has proved her right to be considered the chief female composer of America, but there is no necessity for her to constantly use the largest form of composition to demonstrate this. In the lesser forms she would be greater.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Violoncello concerto is finely adapted to its instrument, and it shows the skill of scoring which is characteristic of every recent work by this composer. It received a performance by Mr. Alwin Schroeder that must have gladdened the composer's heart; surety of intonation, breadth of tone, improvisational freedom and tender expression were in the performance, and it was no wonder that recall followed recall at the close, a triumph in which Mr. Schroeder forced Mr. Loeffler to participate. Mr. Schroeder also received a wreath of that vegetable of glory—the laurel—bound with the German colors.

The cadenza work was brilliant in the extreme, even the harmonics, which are not often reliable upon the violoncello, being clear as crystal. The free fantasie style of the work does not altogether appeal to the reviewer; we have too much of freedom in our modern music; composers are beginning to regard form as if it were an absolute fetter. Form is only contrast reduced to law, and one can have as much variety within the accepted forms as outside of them; there is no perceptible monotony in the human face, for example, yet all faces have the same relationship of parts.

We enjoyed the Russian theme and its treatment best of all the long work. This theme is as wild and rollicking as a Kamarinskaia, the kicking men's dance of Russia. It may have been Caviare to the general, but its dashing treatment made it exciting to all.

If Tschaikowsky named his musical picture of the Holy War "1812," this frisky modern setting of Russian enjoyments is modern enough to be entitled "1898". And it is pleasant to find that Mr. Loeffler is not always sorrowful; in this work the composer emerges from his dank and mouldering gloom and actually smiles! It is healthier music than ghoul-like serenades, carnivals of skeletons, and children who die very lingering deaths on the viol d'amour.

With a bit of Bohemian national music by Smetana, the programme ended. "Vltava" was the closing number. "Vltava" is not a patent medicine, but the Bohemian name for the river Moldau, if we are not mistaken. The river aforesaid flows on with a steadiness only excelled by the flow of the Rhine as given in Wagner's aqueous music. But Smetana wreaths the glory of his native land around his river.

To the present writer there is always something thrilling or exalting in Smetana's orchestral pictures; a man thoroughly in earnest is bound to make an impression on all but the radically superficial; and Smetana was deeply in earnest, for he was laboring for a re-establishment of Bohemian art, prostrate ever since the 30 year's war; he was a pioneer, and though fate showered every sorrow down upon him, death of loved ones, deafness, finally madness, his pure gold was refined in the furnace of affliction.

wrong,
They learn in suffering what they teach in song."

Smetana's personal sorrows and the wrongs of his country have made his genius the stronger. Dvorak has become in some degree Teutonized. Bohemian music has as yet, therefore, but the one great standard-bearer—Bedrich Smetana.

The strong contrasts of the work, the pensive and the warlike themes, the wedding and the hunting music, were excellently brought out by the orchestra, and the climaxes were grandly worked up by Mr. Paur's interpretation. It was a good culmination and the orchestra played it as if they enjoyed it.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.
Seventy-fifth year—Vol. LIII. No. 267
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

An Interesting Programme of Old Numbers With Mr. Alwin Schroeder as Soloist.

The programme for the 15th Symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening ws a programme of favorites. It was:

Symphony, E minor, "Gaelic" .... Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra ....C. M. Loeffler
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau" .... Smetana

Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the soloist.

The symphony loses none of its pleasing qualities on a second hearing; rather, in fact, this composition of Mrs. Beach improves as one becomes more familiar with its several numbers. The second and finale are still the most favorably received, with the second the real musical gem of the symphony.

The 'cello concerto, with that eminent 'cellist, Alwin Schroeder as soloist, could not be otherwise than interesting, and yet the work is by no means one of Mr. Loeffler's best efforts.

The Smetana selection has all the peculiarities of the composer, and even with its strange theme of sadness, possesses a certain interest, which it is somewhat difficult to explain.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; recitative and air from Handel's "Alessandro"; violoncello solos by Goltermann and Popper; Schumann's symphony, in D-minor, No. 4; two songs by Arthur Foote, and selections from the ballet music of Rubenstein's "Der Daemon." Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schultz are to be the soloists.

The Beacon
BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 12, 1898.

MRS. BEACH'S SYMPHONY.

The Symphony rehearsal and concert of this week are of particular interest to Bostonians, as the symphony itself is the work of our popular and most beloved Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. To write a really poetic and thoroughly artistic symphony is a great thing for any musician to accomplish and an undertaking in which many have signally failed.

Mrs. Beach's reputation, however, is more thoroughly established than ever with each repetition of this beautiful Gaelic symphony. She is too thoroughly a musician and too sensitive an artist to fall short of the best, and this fact she has demonstrated in the many songs and instrumental compositions with which she has enriched the present-day musical literature; but it is in the Gaelic symphony that she rises to the greatest heights, and most thoroughly demonstrates her right to be ranked with the leading composers of the time.

The concert this evening begins promptly at eight, and Mrs. Beach's symphony comes first on the program.

[81]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1898.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the following evening was also very largely attended. Madame Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist on this occasion, and while not in as good voice as she has been heard here on former ocasions, she nevertheless thoroughly merited the applause she received. The work of the orchestra surpassed that of anything heard here this season. As a matter of fact the playing of this orchestra is, as a rule, beyond criticism, but on this occasion both orchestra and director seemed to rise to the demands of the evening's program, and I question if any such performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture has ever been heard in Baltimore.

The fine program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot fail to attract large audiences. There have been many inquiries concerning the student tickets, and this move bids fair to revolutionize musical matters among the young people, which means as surely as night follows day that interest will be more general in every circle in music. How the students have been neglected so long is a marvel to me, and it is with pride that I repeat that New York students were very numerous at the last concert, which does make it seem as though New York ought to follow in the footsteps of Brooklyn, when its own young people will cross the bridge for the inducement offered over here.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., February 13, 1898.

THE musical development of Providence during the last ten years has been remarkable. We have a splendid choral society, the Arion Club, which sings as well, if not better, than many more pretentious clubs in larger cities. We have two good chamber music organizations, which, with the Kneisel Quartet, gave altogether nine well attended concerts.

We have a large number of hard-working, enthusiastic teachers, and a number of amateur orchestras help the cultivation of music in the homes.

The concert previous to the last one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a remarkably tame affair, somewhat historical, while the last—throughout Pan-Slavian—was almost hysterical. The benevolent spirit of our all-beloved Herr Paur seems to think the musical digestion of our good people in danger. Be ye not afraid! We can stand anything, even "Zarathustra" backward, which in the four-hand score sounds just as well as the right way. We are constantly in training. We have two miserable brass bands playing twice a day from the balcony of our temples of the muses, both at the same time, and by-and-by we will even enjoy the sinking of Sinbad's ship in "Scheherazade." Why on earth was it ever launched?

The program of the concert was: "Ruy Blas" overture, "Pastorale" symphony, a mouldy 'cello sonata by Locatelli beautifully played by Schroeder as a pièce de résistance, and a Smetana overture. Beethoven's "Pastorale" seems to be the least interesting of all his symphonies. The only redeeming feature is the storm movement. The stupendous effect Beethoven produces here with the most ordinary means is simply marvelous, especially when compared with the noise producing elements let loose on such occasions by our modern composers.

The last concert was a diametrical contrast. It was a modern Russian concert. The neo-Russian school is at present one of the most productive in art, and there is hardly any doubt that the supremacy in music will be theirs in the future. This nation, compared with others, is still in a rather crude state of civilization, and has a tremendous fund of racial feeling, a strong, pronounced individuality in language, thought and religion. The unsettled state of its inner affairs, the striving for individual freedom of the intelligent classes, will greatly help their productive power Tschaikowsky's sixth (Pathetique) is a strange work. At the first hearing it will stagger one with its passion, its dramatic fire and the ravishing sensuousness of its sorrow-laden mood. At the second hearing, certain dramatic effects—one may almost say theatrical—lose much of their effectiveness when anticipated. The last is the most touching movement, although to me the third is the strongest. It will always be admired by friends of power and strength, who can see through the thin coat of our superficial culture, and see the points that occasionally remind us of our true origin.

The last number was "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Even the most ardent admirer of the ultra modern school and their impressionistic handling of musical material must admit that this kind of program music was not all heavenly joy. Taking its orchestral garb away there is but little body, and still less soul, left. The first movement, especially, with the never ending variations of its poor Wagnerian motive, tires one very soon, and the second one is spun out too long for its absolute musical value. After an incoherent period, the last movement starts in better, only to lose itself in a noisy production of brutal orchestral force. Such compositions are splendid to show off the enormous skill and technic of an orchestra, and the playing by the Bostonians was simply marvelous If the succession of the numbers had been reversed, with the symphony last, the concert would have been by far more lasting in its impression; being, as it was, one of the most interesting of the season.

Olive Mead With Boston Symphony.

Here are some press notices of Miss Olive Mead's performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on January 28 and 29:

When a soloist is recalled again and again by a symphony rehearsal audience—usually undemonstrative to a degree—while artists of Mr. Paur's orchestra joined enthusiastically in the plaudits at the time, the fact is significant of a very decided success indeed. The young violinist Miss Olive Mead, in whose career a goodly number of residents in greater Boston are interested, is entitled to warm congratulations over a triumph that was at once popular and artistic.

The playing of the young artist in Saint-Saëns' Concerto for violin No. 3, which constituted her offering to the Symphony program last week, is in truth entitled to warm praise. Miss Mead is in every sense of the term the mistress of her instrument. If now and again she failed to evoke quite the strength of tone which an Ysaye was able to present in this concerto, in delicacy of touch, richness of tone and finely delicate appreciation of the composer's thought, Miss Mead's performance left nothing to be desired. Add to this that the embellished passages of the concerto were executed with a skill and speed that were the more marvelous because of the lack of all apparent effort in her playing, and the "reason why" of her noteworthy success will readily be understood.

The name of Olive Mead is well assured of a high place in the ranks of the distinguished women violinists of our time.—Boston Sunday Globe, January 30.

Miss Olive Mead, a pupil of Mr. Kneisel, comes forward as an admirably equipped violinist. Young and inexperienced though she be, she has a cool self-possession that many an older hand might envy her; it is not often that one finds a neophyte face a large audience with so untrembling a bow arm. Her tone is warm, full, smooth and brilliant, her technic very highly developed; her phrasing is musicianly and graceful, and she gives evidence of fine and cultivated musical feeling. Hers is the honestest sort of violin playing; straightforward, free from tricks, full of a warmth of sentiment which seems to be just now in the transition stage between girlish callowness and maturer depth. In a word, she made a very fine impression indeed, and was repeatedly and enthusiastically recalled.—Boston Transcript, January 30.

Miss Olive Mead proved to be a young artist of fine musical instinct, and of really exceptional ability. She has a large and full tone, her intonation is without a flaw, her bowing is free and graceful, and her technic is remarkable in its easy fluency, its certainty and its finish. She plays in a style marked by elegance, breadth and distinction, with confidence and authority, and with thorough musicianly taste.

Her performance of the Saint-Saëns concerto was very beautiful indeed, in all that regards the technical essentials of her art and maturity of skill generally. From the beginning to the end of her efforts her playing was singularly interesting and attractive in its freedom from affectation and in its frank sincerity. The slow movement was given with delightful purity of taste and grace of phrasing, and in the more brilliant and exacting moments of the work she acquitted herself with unfailing exactness.

Miss Mead is decidedly an artist of whom much may be confidently expected when she has grown in experience and has gained something more of warmth, variety and passionateness in expression. The honor of so young an artist appearing at a Symphony concert was fully justified by the admirably guided talent that she manifested. She at once won the good will of her audience, which applauded her with exceptional enthusiasm after each movement, and vigorously recalled her four or five times at the end of the concerto. Her success was overwhelming. Miss Mead has studied under Mr. Kneisel, who may well take pride in his pupil.—Boston Sunday Herald, January 30 .

The interest of the concert, however, centered in the soloist, Miss Olive Mead. This artist has steadily improved in her work, and has now reached the point of excellence where she may successfully challenge comparison with older violinists. She has taste, intelligence and skill, and she is the interpreter as well as the player. Her work at this concert was most satisfactory and most delightful. She reached to the very heart of her work, reading it like a true artist—her phrasing showing rare intelligence—and playing it with rare technical skill. It was a most finished, careful and thoughtful piece of work, played in a large, broad, fluent style and with unaffected sincerity. There were brilliancy, grace, solidity and feeling, and excuses on the plea of youth were not needed. The difficulties of the work were conquered by Miss Mead with graceful ease, but excellent as is her technic, large and free as is her bowing, she compels one to listen to her as artist, and full satisfaction is the result. Miss Mead deservedly won the admiration and enthusiasm of her audience, and if her progress in the future is as rapid as in the past she will soon stand in the very front rank of her art.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, January 30.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, FEB. 16, 1898.

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The regular monthly concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tonight at Music Hall. It will afford lovers of symphonic music the opportunity of hearing two of the most famous compositions of modern times. These are Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Scheherazado" and Tschirkowski's "Pathetic" Symphony. While both of these composers are Russians, the former the acknowledged leader of the "young Russin" school of musical writers, their education and tendencies were in marked contrast. Other interesting features of the programme will be Mr. Loeffler's Fantastic Concerto, the 'cello part being played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder, and three selections from Berlioz's popular work, "The Damnation of Faust."

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company,
53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1898.

Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet.

The propagandists of superlative orchestral music who haile from Boston paid this community another visit yesterday. They were welcomed at the Metropolitan Opera-House by an assemblage of music lovers who have learned to appreciate these occasional visitations at their true art value.

For this concert of the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Emil Paur had completed a programme in which there was much novelty—a violin composition by C. M. Loeffler, the second concert master; a symphony by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, an American woman composer, and a symphonic lurte by Rimsky-Korsakoff, one of the modern Russians.

Mr. Loeffler is certainly an original thinker in music. His devices are ultra-modern. He believes that if a musical form exists it can be used. He sees no reason why the full vocabulary of music should not be employed. He has ideas and he expresses them eloquently. His command of instrumental color is large. He is daring and is not restrained by conventionality. The "Divermento" for violin and orchestra, played by himself last evening, is a striking work. Its individuality is marked. It is replete with effects which are new in orchestral music. The composer played it excellently, but with a tone that was very thin. The orchestra played the accompaniment with an affectionate feeling, which illustrated the esprit de corps of the organization.

Mrs. Beach's symphony is a remarkable exhibition of the composer's thorough knowledge of orchestration. It is all the more remarkable when the fact is known that the composer is almost entirely self-taught.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite is a symphony in which poetic license has affected fixed forms. The music is vibrant with life. It tells an Oriental tale in vivid tone-colors, harmonized in a manner most delightfully ingenious.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS

Broadway and Fulton St., New York

FRIDAY EVENING, FEB. 18, 1898.

Although Mr. Emil Paur transgressed the canons of programme making, as those elastic regulations are generally understood, by putting three important new compositions, all of large dimensions, on last night's bill, at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House, the result was one of the most interesting entertainments of the series. The new works were Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Divertimento," for violin and orchestra, in A minor, opus 9; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's "Gaelic," symphony in E minor, opus 32, and the Rinsky-Korsakoff suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35, of which last, however, only three of the four movements were played. Besides these, the programme contained the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven as an opening piece, and the "Minuet of "Will-O'-the-Wisps," the "Waltz of Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." The concert was long, but the interest of the large audience was sustained throughout.

Mr. Loeffler's divertimento followed the Egmont overture, the composer, who shares Mr. Kneisel's desk in the Boston Orchestra, being the soloist. The term divertimento has a range of meaning wide enough to take in a much more recondite form than the one Mr. Loeffler has employed. Mozart used the appellation for pieces nearly like the serenade, the number of movements varying from four to ten. Sir George Grove also calls a potpourri of operatic airs, arranged for piano, a divertimento. In Mr. Loeffler's composition there is not much variation from the form of a concerto. The first movement, "Preamble," begins with an allegro introduction, the solo violin presenting rushing passage work in arpeggios. Then comes the first theme, lento, followed by a working out by the wood wind, the solo instrument having returned to its rapid arpeggio work. The second theme enters, is developed, the solo violin once more devoting its attention to arpeggio playing. The first theme returns as a coda and the first movement ends. Thus far, the work might have been a concerto. The second movement, "Eglogue," is the free development of a single theme by the solo instrument, a curious feature of the orchestration being the omission of the violins from the scoring. The third and last movement, "Carnaval des Morts," consists of variations on the theme "Dies irae, dies illa."

The work is decidedly interesting, though Mr. Loeffler has spun it out to a length scarcely commensurate with its material. The themes are generally fertile, but there is a monotony, in the first movement, in the constant arpeggio passages by the solo violin. The scoring is extremely skillful, as New Yorkers have come to expect from Mr. Loeffler, who has previously figured here as a composer. The solo instrument has scarcely a rest through the whole work. The divertimento was played last night in a way that seemed to bring out most of its possibilities. The composer was warmly applauded.

Mrs. Beach's symphony and the "Scheherazade" suite had both been heard in Brooklyn before last evening, and in Boston they were brought forward some time ago. The symphony is an ambitious composition, written with fairly close adherence to the symphonic form in the first and last movements, the second being a slightly irregular version of the scherzo, which is usually placed third, and the third being a slow movement of Gaelic character, which would ordinarily have been the second movement. Mrs. Beach has adopted devices of the most modern sort whenever it has seemed appropriate. She has placed her symphony in a class with those of Dvorak and Tschaikowsky, so far as concerns the instrumentation. She has not been content to begin by limiting herself to the orchestral coloring in vogue, for example, by Mendelssohn, but has equipped herself with every new power discovered since his day, thus extending her opportunities and at the same time refusing to take advantage of any allowances that might be made for a first attempt.

As far as a single hearing of such a work counts in forming a correct appreciation of it, the conclusion reached last night was that Mrs. Beach had found excellent thematic material, and had worked it up with admirable skill. There seemed nothing feminine about the music. It was earnest, sincere, strongly knit and not without originality. The impression gained was distinctly a pleasant one.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite, "Scheherazade," was the subject of brief comment here after its Brooklyn performance in December. A second hearing reveals more clearly the Oriental character of its rhythms, and of its orchestration, which is quite appropriate for a composition dealing with episodes from the "Arabian Nights." The graceful music is descriptive, but one needs no programme to enjoy it.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1898.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the following evening was also very largely attended. Madame Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist on this occasion, and while not in as good voice as she has been heard here on former occasions, she nevertheless thoroughly merited the applause she received. The work of the orchestra surpassed that of anything heard here this season. As a matter of fact the playing of this orchestra is, as a rule, beyond criticism, but on this occasions both orchestra and director seemed to rise to the demands of the evening's program, and I question if any such performance of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture has ever been heard in Baltimore.

The fine program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra cannot fail to attract large audiences. There have been many inquiries concerning the student tickets, and this move bids fair to revolutionize musical matters among the young people, which means as surely as night follows day that interest will be more general in every circle in music. How the students have been neglected so long is a marvel to me, and it is with pride that I repeat that New York students were very numerous at the last concert, which does make it seem as though New York ought to follow in the footsteps of Brooklyn, when its own young people will cross the bridge for the inducement offered over here.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., February 13, 1898.

THE musical development of Providence during the last ten years has been remarkable. We have a splendid choral society, the Arion Club, which sings as well, if not better, than many more pretentious clubs in larger cities. We have two good chamber music organizations, which, with the Kneisel Quartet, gave altogether nine well attended concerts.

We have a large number of hard-working, enthusiastic teachers, and a number of amateur orchestras help the cultivation of music in the homes.

The concert previous to the last one of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a remarkably tame affair, somewhat historical, while the last—throughout Pan-Slavian—was almost hysterical. The benevolent spirit of our all-beloved Herr Paur seems to think the musical digestion of our good people in danger. Be ye not afraid! We can stand anything, even "Zarathustra" backward, which in the four-hand score sounds just as well as the right way. We are constantly in training. We have two miserable brass bands playing twice a day from the balcony of our temples of the muses, both at the same time, and by-and-by we will even enjoy the sinking of Sinbad's ship in "Scheherazade." Why on earth was it ever launched?

The program of the concert was: "Ruy Blas" overture, "Pastorale" symphony, a mouldy 'cello sonata by Locatelli beautifully played by Schroeder as a pièce de résistance, and a Smetana overture. Beethoven's "Pastorale" seems to be the least interesting of all his symphonies. The only redeeming feature is the storm movement. The stupendous effect Beethoven produces here with the most ordinary means is simply marvelous, especially when compared with the noise producing elements let loose on such occasions by our modern composers.

The last concert was a diametrical contrast. It was a modern Russian concert. The neo-Russian school is at present one of the most productive in art, and there is hardly any doubt that the supremacy in music will be theirs in the future. This nation, compared with others, is still in a rather crude state of civilization, and has a tremendous fund of racial feeling, a strong, pronounced individuality in language, thought and religion. The unsettled state of its inner affairs, the striving for individual freedom of the intelligent classes, will greatly help their productive power. Tschaikowsky's sixth (Pathetique) is a strange work. At the first hearing it will stagger one with its passion, its dramatic fire and the ravishing sensuousness of its sorrow-laden mood. At the second hearing, certain dramatic effects—one may almost say theatrical—lose much of their effectiveness when anticipated. The last is the most touching movement, although to me the third is the strongest. It will always be admired by friends of power and strength, who can see through the thin coat of our superficial culture and see the points that occasionally remind us of our true origin.

The last number was "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Even the most ardent admirer of the ultra modern school and their impressionistic handling of musical material must admit that this kind of program music was not all heavenly joy. Taking its orchestral garb away there is but little body, and still less soul, left. The first movement, especially, with the never ending variations of its poor Wagnerian motive tires one very soon, and the second is spun out too long for its absolute musical value. After a coherent period, the last movement starts in better, only to lose itself in a noisy production of brutal orchestral force. Such compositions are splendid to show off the enormous skill and technic of an orchestra, and the playing by the Bostonians was simply marvelous. If the succession of the numbers had been reversed, with the symphony last, the concert would have been by far more lasting in its impression, being, as it was, one of the most interesting of the season.

Olive Mead With Boston Symphony.

Here are some press notices of Miss Olive Mead's performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on January 28 and 29:

When a soloist is recalled again and again by a symphony rehearsal audience—usually undemonstrative to a degree—while artists of Mr. Paur's orchestra joined enthusiastically in the plaudits at the time, the fact is significant of a very decided success indeed. The young violinist Miss Olive Mead, in whose career a goodly number of residents in greater Boston are interested, is entitled to warm congratulations over a triumph that was at once popular and artistic.

The playing of the young artist in Saint-Saëns' Concerto for violin No. 3, which constituted her offering to the Symphony program last week, is in truth entitled to warm praise. Miss Mead is in every sense of the term the mistress of her instrument. If now and again she failed to evoke quite the strength of tone which an Ysaye was able to present in this concerto, in delicacy of touch, richness of tone and finely delicate appreciation of the composer's thought, Miss Mead's performance left nothing to be desired. Add to this that the embellished passages of the concerto were executed with a skill and speed that were the more marvelous because of the lack of all apparent effort in her playing, and the "reason why" of her noteworthy success will readily be understood.

The name of Olive Mead is well assured of a high place in the ranks of the distinguished women violinists of our time.—Boston Sunday Globe, January 30.

Miss Olive Mead, a pupil of Mr. Kneisel, comes forward as an admirably equipped violinist. Young and inexperienced though she be, she has a cool self-possession that many an older hand might envy her; it is not often that one finds a neophyte face a large audience with so untrembling a bow arm. Her tone is warm, full, smooth and brilliant, her technic very highly developed; her phrasing is musicianly and graceful, and she gives evidence of fine and cultivated musical feeling. Hers is the honestest sort of violin playing; straightforward, free from tricks, full of a warmth of sentiment which seems to be just now in the transition stage between girlish callowness and maturer depth. In a word, she made a very fine impression indeed, and was repeatedly and enthusiastically recalled.—Boston Transcript, January 30.

Miss Olive Mead proved to be a young artist of fine musical instinct, and of really exceptional ability. She has a large and full tone, her intonation is without a flaw, her bowing is free and graceful, and her technic is remarkable in its easy fluency, its certainty and its finish. She plays in a style marked by elegance, breadth and distinction, with confidence and authority, and with thorough musicianly taste.

Her performance of the Saint-Saëns concerto was very beautiful indeed, in all that regards the technical essentials of her art and maturity of skill generally. From the beginning to the end of her efforts her playing was singularly interesting and attractive in its freedom from affectation and in its frank sincerity. The slow movement was given with delightful purity of taste and grace of phrasing, and in the more brilliant and exacting moments of the work she acquitted herself with unfailing exactness.

Miss Mead is decidedly an artist of whom much may be confidently expected when she has grown in experience and has gained something more of warmth, variety and passionateness in expression. The honor of so young an artist appearing at a Symphony concert was fully justified by the admirably guided talent that she manifested. She at once won the good will of her audience, which applauded her with exceptional enthusiasm after each movement, and vigorously recalled her four or five times at the end of the concerto. Her success was overwhelming. Miss Mead has studied under Mr. Kneisel, who may well take pride in his pupil.—Boston Sunday Herald, January 30 .

The interest of the concert, however, centered in the soloist, Miss Olive Mead. This artist has steadily improved in her work, and has now reached the point of excellence where she may successfully challenge comparison with older violinists. She has taste, intelligence and skill, and she is the interpreter as well as the player. Her work at this concert was most satisfactory and most delightful. She reached to the very heart of her work, reading it like a true artist—her phrasing showing rare intelligence—and playing it with rare technical skill. It was a most finished, careful and thoughtful piece of work, played in a large, broad, fluent style and with unaffected sincerity. There were brilliancy, grace, solidity and feeling, and excuses on the plea of youth were not needed. The difficulties of the work were conquered by Miss Mead with graceful ease, but excellent as is her technic, large and free as is her bowing, she compels one to listen to her as artist, and full satisfaction is the result. Miss Mead deservedly won the admiration and enthusiasm of her audience, and if her progress in the future is as rapid as in the past she will soon stand in the very front rank of her art.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, January 30.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, FEB. 16, 1898.

Boston Symphony Tonight.

The regular monthly concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given tonight at Music Hall. It will afford lovers of symphonic music the opportunity of hearing two of the most famous compositions of modern times. These are Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Seheherazado" and Tschirkowski's "Pathetic" Symphony. While both of these composers are Russians, the former the acknowledged leader of the "young Russin" school of musical writers, their education and tendeneies were in marked contrast. Other interesting features of the programme will be Mr. Loeffler's Fantastic Concerto, the 'cello part being played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder, and three selections from Berlioz's popular work, "The Damnation of Faust."

The World.

Published by the Press Publishing Company,
53 to 63 PARK ROW, New York.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1898.

Concerts by the Symphony Orchestra and the Kneisel Quartet.

The propagandists of superlative orchestral music who haile from Boston paid this community another visit yesterday. They were welcomed at the Metropolitan Opera-House by an assemblage of music lovers who have learned to appreciate these occasional visitations at their true art value.

For this concert of the Symphony Orchestra Mr. Emil Paur had completed a programme in which there was much novelty—a violin composition by C. M. Loeffler, the second concert master; a symphony by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, an American woman composer, and a symphonic lurte by Rimsky-Korsakoff, one of the modern Russians.

Mr. Loeffler is certainly an original thinker in music. His devices are ultra-modern. He believes that if a musical form exists it can be used. He sees no reason why the full vocabulary of music should not be employed. He has ideas and he expresses them eloquently. His command of instrumental color is large. He is daring and is not restrained by conventionality. The "Divermento" for violin and orchestra, played by himself last evening, is a striking work. Its individuality is marked. It is replete with effects which are new in orchestral music. The composer played it excellently, but with a tone that was very thin. The orchestra played the accompaniment with an affectionate feeling, which illustrated the esprit de corps of the organization.

Mrs. Beach's symphony is a remarkable exhibition of the composer's thorough knowledge of orchestration. It is all the more remarkable when the fact is known that the composer is almost entirely self-taught.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite is a symphony in which poetic license has affected fixed forms. The music is vibrant with life. It tells an Oriental tale in vivid tone-colors, harmonized in a manner most delightfully ingenius.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS,
Broadway and Fulton St., New York

FRIDAY EVENING, FEB. 18, 1898.

Although Mr. Emil Paur transgressed the canons of programme making, as those elastic regulations are generally understood, by putting three important new compositions, all of large dimensions, on last night's bill, at the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House, the result was one of the most interesting entertainments of the series. The new works were Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Divertimento," for violin and orchestra, in A minor, opus 9; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's "Gaelic," symphony in E minor, opus 32, and the Rinsky-Korsakoff suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35, of which last, however, only three of the four movements were played. Besides these, the programme contained the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven as an opening piece, and the "Minuet of "Will-O'-the-Wisps," the "Waltz of Sylphs" and the "Rakoczy March" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." The concert was long, but the interest of the large audience was sustained throughout.

Mr. Loeffler's divertimento followed the Egmont overture, the composer, who shares Mr. Kneisel's desk in the Boston Orchestra, being the soloist. The term divertimento has a range of meaning wide enough to take in a much more recondite form than the one Mr. Loeffler has employed. Mozart used the appellation for pieces nearly like the serenade, the number of movements varying from four to ten. Sir George Grove also calls a potpourri of operatic airs, arranged for piano, a divertimento. In Mr. Loeffler's composition there is not much variation from the form of a concerto. The first movement, "Preamble," begins with an allegro introduction, the solo violin presenting rushing passage work in arpeggios. Then comes the first theme, lento, followed by a working out by the wood wind, the solo instrument having returned to its rapid arpeggio work. The second theme enters, is developed, the solo violin once more devoting its attention to arpeggio playing. The first theme returns as a coda and the first movement ends. Thus far, the work might have been a concerto. The second movement, "Eglogue," is the free development of a single theme by the solo instrument, a curious feature of the orchestration being the omission of the violins from the scoring. The third and last movement, "Carnaval des Morts," consists of variations on the theme "Dies irae, dies illa."

The work is decidedly interesting, though Mr. Loeffler has spun it out to a length scarcely commensurate with its material. The themes are generally fertile, but there is a monotony, in the first movement, in the constant arpeggio passages by the solo violin. The scoring is extremely skillful, as New Yorkers have come to expect from Mr. Loeffler, who has previously figured here as a composer. The solo instrument has scarcely a rest through the whole work. The divertimento was played last night in a way that seemed to bring out most of its possibilities. The composer was warmly applauded.

Mrs. Beach's symphony and the "Scheherazade" suite had both been heard in Brooklyn before last evening, and in Boston they were brought forward some time ago. The symphony is an ambitious composition, written with fairly close adherence to the symphonic form in the first and last movements, the second being a slightly irregular version of the scherzo, which is usually placed third, and the third being a slow movement of Gaelic character, which would ordinarily have been the second movement. Mrs. Beach has adopted devices of the most modern sort whenever it has seemed appropriate. She has placed her symphony in a class with those of Dvorak and Tschaikowsky, so far as concerns the instrumentation. She has not been content to begin by limiting herself to the orchestral coloring in vogue, for example, by Mendelssohn, but has equipped herself with every new power discovered since his day, thus extending her opportunities and at the same time refusing to take advantage of any allowances that might be made for a first attempt.

As far as a single hearing of such a work counts in forming a correct appreciation of it, the conclusion reached last night was that Mrs. Beach had found excellent thematic material, and had worked it up with admirable skill. There seemed nothing feminine about the music. It was earnest, sincere, strongly knit and not without originality. The impression gained was distinctly a pleasant one.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite, "Scheherazade," was the subject of brief comment here after its Brooklyn performance in December. A second hearing reveals more clearly the Oriental character of its rhythms, and of its orchestration, which is quite appropriate for a composition dealing with episodes from the "Arabian Nights." The graceful music is descriptive, but one needs no programme to enjoy it.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The Commercial Advertiser Association.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 18, 1898.

The fourth concert of the season's series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented three very welcome novelties in Mrs. Beach's Gaelic Symphony, Mr. C. M. Loeffler's Divertimento for violin and orchestra, played by the composer, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Symphonic Suite Scheherazade. Of the first and last we have heard very much, for they have been much discussed by musicians and critics. Of Mr. Loeffler, who shares the first desk of the orchestra with Mr. Kneisel, we have known something through his chamber music and have been hearing still more of him as a composer on account of his new symphonic poem, Tintagiles, which Mr. Paur and his men played in Boston last month.

Mr. Paur's liberal policy of encouraging his men to undertake original work has borne valuable fruits already, and, if pursued, will undoubtedly bring still more. The advantage accrues to both sides, for, while the members of the orchestra find early opportunities to get their works heard in the best possible manner, the orchestra as a whole and the public gain in hearing new and meritorious compositions. Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento has much in it that is interesting. It is the result of a sound and musicianly scholarship united with a large amount of striking originality. It is a thing which, as a general rule, will appeal more to the musician than to the general public, although the beauty of parts of it will strike deep into the heart of any music lover. It is full of great technical difficulties that are likely to preclude the possibility of its ever becoming popular with the average concert soloist, but at the same time it exhibits in all its varied phases the possibilities and the manifold beauties of the violin.

There are three movements in the work, a Preambule (Allegro, A minor); an Eclogue (Andante, F major); and Carnaval des Morts (Moderato, A minor). The first movement is the working out of two principal themes, one consisting of rapid passage work, a kind of a perpetuum mobile, and the other a beautiful flowing melodic cantilena sung by the solo instrument, accompanied by the harp, and later by the whole orchestra. There is a chasteness in the form, a depth of thought in the conception and a brilliancy in the orchestration that at once attracts and holds the close attention of the auditor. The second movement is the working out in simple form of an exquisite melody. Here Mr. Loeffler has shown his appreciation of beautiful color effects in his orchestra. For the greater part of the time the solo instrument stands out alone against the harp and wind choirs, the working out bringing into strong contrast with the violin the English horn and two muted trumpets. Of the three movements the second makes strongest appeal to the average hearer. Mr. Loeffler takes for the theme of his last movement in Dies Iræ, and the movement consists of various intricate and oftentimes startling variations on that uncanny melody. If there is a criticism to be made of the last, it is that it is too long.

Mr. Loeffler showed himself a violinist of the very first order. His tone was large, clear and brilliant, his technique masterful, and his style full of finished grace. In addition to these, he has a most attractive personality that counts for much in a player. He received much enthusiastic applause.

Mrs. Beach's symphony has much in it that is very attractive. One hearing is very insufficient to appreciate fully a work of such magnitude, and it is possible that if it were heard again opinion might change. The impression left by it last night was that it was altogether charming. It showed much skill of orchestration and invention of melody. There is not in it great profundity of thought, but there is much promise of better things to come from the composer. The themes have much true poetry in them, and the composer has worked them out with a firm hand and a great fertility of resource. The second and third movements are especially attractive in their melodic form and development. In the former is a strong contrast between the graceful melody, Alla Siciliana, which begins and ends it and the ingenuous scherzo that comes in the middle. The first theme of the third movement is a melody with a bewitching Gaelic lilt worked out by the solo violin and 'cello on muted strings, followed by another melody for the orchestra tutti, and again by a third of folksong style. These two movements particularly are full of poetic beauty, and in them Mrs. Beach by her melodies and their treatment achieves the characetristics indicated by the name she has given to her symphony. At the end of the first movement also there is a theme that emphasizes the local color of the work. The first and last movements are specimens of brilliant orchestral work, but their effect is weaker than the intervening ones. The dominant tone of the composition is one of sadness, in keeping with its Gaelic character, and one could ask for stronger contrasts with this than appear.

The New York Times

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 18, 1898.

Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House.

The fourth concert of the twelfth season in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. The programme consisted of Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," C. M. Loeffler's divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. H. A. A. Beach's Gaelic symphony, three familiar concert numbers from Hector Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite entitled "Scheherazade." Of these the second and third and fifth were novelties in Manhattan, the last having been played once in Brooklyn. Mr. Loeffler is one of the first violinists of the orchestra, sitting at the desk with Mr. Kneisel, and he appeared as the soloist in his own composition.

Mr. Loeffler is a young man, a German by birth, and has already made himself favorably known as a composer. The delightful composition produced here last night will surely add to his reputation. It is in three movements, a "Preamble," an "Eclogue," and a "Carnival des Morts." The first of these opens with a passage which, by its melodic style and its fine exposition of some of the best qualities of the solo instrument, shows that the composer has been a close student of Bach's violin sonatas. This passage soon works into a sort of perpetuum mobile theme, which is followed by a broad singing melody of genuine beauty. There are a few resplendent tutti passages, and at the end of the movement the first themes are heard again. The "Eclogue" is a wholly admirable specimen of elegiac composition. It is wholly free in form, and consists of a development of a songlike melody by alternate solo and orchestra treatment. Some of the instrumental effects in this movement are very ingenious, the stopped trumpets and the glissandi on the harp giving some bizarre tints. The final movement is a set of variations on the old "Dies irae."

It is tremendously difficult for the solo instrument, embracing as it does all the feats of violin playing, yet it is solid, good music, full of interest, and uncommon in its display of mastery of the technics of composition. The work as a whole is full of melody, color, and feeling, and it ought to become one of the stock pieces of the violinist's répertoire. Mr. Loeffler played the solo part with large tone, perfect intonation, grace and finish of style, and incessant charm. The orchestra gave him an accompaniment which was a work of brotherly love. He was enthusiastically recalled several times.

Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, which has not been heard here before, goes toward showing that composition is not beyond the grasp of the feminine mind. This symphony is not a profound work and it makes no attempt at an exploration of the classic methods of development. But as a series of tone pictures it has considerable charm. The first and last movements are somewhat turgid in style and uncertain in form, but they have a good deal of vigor and are rich in color. The two middle movements, which are built on melodies of Celtic character and ingeniously treated with solo passages, are engaging by their simple and fluent melody.

The Rimsky-Korsakoff "Scheherazadi" is delightful. Its three movements are entitled "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess," and "Festival at Bagdad—the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship." All three are full of delicious melody, and are clear and symmetrical in form. They are orchestrated most beautifully, and the solo violin passages gave Mr. Kneisel an opportunity to exhibit his lovely tone to advantage. The concert as a whole was a superb display of virtuosity by the entire orchestra, every department distinguishing itself in tone and technic. Mr. Paur conducted admirably.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The main feature of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, was the "Divertimento" for violin and orchestra by Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler.

The programme said of Mr. Loeffler, "born at Mühlhausen-on-the-Rhine, on January 30, 1861; still living," the truth of which latter biographical detail was made incontrovertibly apparent by Mr. Loeffler's stepping forward to play his own work.

It is a capital composition and especially original in the second division with its opening for muted trumpets and English horn and the silence imposed upon all the violins of the orchestra throughout the movement. Mr. Loeffler received quite an ovation, both from the audience and the orchestra, for his effective playing of his interesting work, which, by the way, is dedicated to Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, of Boston.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, which has not been heard in New York before, also made an excellent impression. Mrs. Beach, who is a Boston amateur, but of professional proficiency, is one of the women composers spoken of in a recent number of the Sunday HERALD.

The "offs" had another inning last night, the concert concluding with a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Nicolai Andrevevitch Rimsky-Korsakoff, and dedicated to Vladimir Stassoff. It proved an interesting and dramatically descriptive work.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, Feb. 18, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Metropolitan Opera-house was not half full last evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert. The fact that there was no prominent soloist may have had something to do with this, but the main cause was doubtless the programme, which was nothing less than a freak. Mr. Paur is notorious for his amazing programmes, but this time he played his best trump card in that lead. First he had the "Coriolan" overture, which was good. Then came a "Divertimento" for violin by a Boston composer, Mr. Loeffler; then a symphony by another Boston composer, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; then some selections from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and finally another novelty, the symphonic suite Scheherazade by Nicolai Andreyevitch Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Conductors seldom put more than one novelty on a programme, but here were three long ones at once, and, not satisfied with this, Mr. Paur made the concert last three-quarters of an hour longer than usual. But these blunders might have been forgiven, had the novelties been interesting. The only one worth producing was the Russian suite, which was so unceremoniously relegated to the end of the entertainment. The orchestra played three movements, entitled, "The Sea and Sindbad's Ship," "The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess," "Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship." Rimsky-Korsakoff's music is fairly descriptive, but lacking in evidence of inventive power. The sinking of the ship is indicated by music which is not merely noisy and agitated, but ingeniously constructed.

A few weeks ago the Boston orchestra played a piece by one of its members, which was worthy of being heard. The same cannot be said of this "Divertimento." The composer himself played the solo violin fairly well, but the work ought not to have been played in public; it has no other than purely technical merit, and for the most part is empty and "fiddly." Mrs. Beach's symphony was even more tiresome. There was perhaps some excuse for producing it, since symphonies written by women are a rarity. If they are to be like this one, it is to be hoped that a rigid quarantine will be established against them. Mrs. Beach has evidently had much opportunity of hearing music, and she has had plenty of practice in composing, the list of her works including several cantatas and about sixty piano pieces. As far as can be judged from her symphony she has not a spark of creative power. The only interesting thing in it was the dainty Siciliano, in the second movement, and a few touches of "Gaelic" coloring. In the orchestration, too, there were several pretty touches, notably in the use of the woodwind. But this was far from atoning for the lack of tangible ideas and the indulgence in over-elaboration. If Mrs. Beach had taken, not a blue pencil, but a pair of scissors, and cut out about two-thirds of her symphony, it might have made a tolerably acceptable piece. As it is, it is an awful bore; she never knows when to stop, but keeps on talking, talking, talking, till one's impatience is transformed into indignation and wrath.

The whole concert was an object lesson; teaching that while a permanent orchestra is an admirable thing, it is, after all, merely an instrument, like a good piano. The best Steinway is tiresome if you play tiresome music on it, or if the player devotes all his attention to precision and virtuosity. Everything in yesterday's programme was played with precision and virtuosity, but there are things in music infinitely higher than those; and these we seldom get from the Boston Orchestra.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, FEB. 16, 1898.

Symphony Will Not Leave Us.

Assistant Manager F. R. Comee of the Symphony said today that the rumor that the organization might not come to Baltimore next year was without foundation. He said he appreciated the compliment of the musical public of New York in suggesting that the Symphony confine itself to Boston and New York, but he also appreciated the warm support that had been given the organization in Baltimore, and that in the future the concerts would be given as in the past. Baltimore is regarded by the Symphony as being one of the cities that give it the most cordial welcome.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1898.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

So long as the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are kept as interesting as was the fourth of the series, given at the Metropolitan Opera House last night, there is no danger that they will lose the goodwill of the music-lovers of New-York, which they are enjoying in generous measure just now. The Boston organization has, indeed, something to offer the metropolis in addition to finished performances. At the December concert Mr. Kneisel played a concerto composed by one of his companion violinists, Mr. Strube, and the listeners were charmed with the talent disclosed by the work. Last night Mr. Kneisel's colleague at the first desk, C. M. Loeffler, had the first opportunity of a comprehensive kind to discover his creative gifts to New-Yorkers. His name did not look quite so strange on the programe as that of Mr. Strube, for some of his chamber music had been played here by Mr. Kneisel and his admirable fellows, and three weeks or so ago The Tribune gave an account of the performance in Boston of a symphonic poem, entitled "Tintaigel," which showed itself entitled to consideration, not only by the eloquence and individuality of its music, but also by the fact that it pointed the way to a revival of interest in that archaic instrument the viola d'amour. The choice of a grewsome marionette drama by Maeterlinck for musical illustration in that instance, and the fact that Mr. Loeffler had on other occasions shown a penchant for the morbid notions which it is the habit of the time to designate as "end-of-the-century," made the composition which Mr. Paur brought forward last night (for which act he deserves our gratitude) seem peculiarly refreshing to those acquainted with the other works. Two movements, at least, of the Divertimento in A minor, for violin and orchestra, are not only sane in purpose and healthy in expression, but are, besides, music from which no unprejudiced and intelligent critic is likely to withhold praise, for its sound and unconstrained scholarship, its downright beauty and its ingenuity. There are new effects in plenty in the work, but they are not bizarre or dragged in to bewilder and amaze. A nice discrimination, a fine sense of tonal effect suggested most of them, and we can only be glad that they were thought of by the composer. It was not only wise to subordinate the violin tone in the accompaniment of the solo instrument, as Mr. Loeffler has done throughout, it was positively a stroke of genius to suppress it altogether as he did in the second movement, and then to modify his wind-instrument tints by uniting his trumpets and bringing the English horn to the fore. And this tells of a nice sense of tone-color, which is so much above the ordinary level, high as that is in this day of large virtuosoship in all departments, that it can be praised on its own account. What was more gratifying, however, was the soundness of Mr. Loeffler's invention and scholarship displayed in the first and second movements (préambule and eglogue) and the ingenuity which marked his variations on the old Gregorian "Dies iræ" melody, out of which he has made the last movement of his Divertimento. Here, however, he could not help showing some of the morbidness invited by the choice of a theme with such associations. He played the solo part of the work superbly and received half a dozen enthusiastic recalls, and then another round of applause half an hour later when he resumed his seat in the orchestra.

The other numbers of the programme were Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," the three familiar instrumental movements from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's symphony in E minor, called "Gaelic," and Rimsky-Korsakow's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade." Concerning the merit of these two compositions, enough has been said by this journal. If an additional remark were to be made it would be the ungallant one that Mrs. Beach's symphony loses on a second hearing, whereas the Russian composer's suite gains. Mr. Paur omitted the second movement.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.

The Evening Sun, per month .20

The Evening Sun, per year $2.00

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur conducting, was heard at the Metropolitan last evening in the fourth concert of its twelfth season in this city. The great opera house was fairly well filled. For a critical assembly, the audience was unusually demonstrative and received with favor all three of the novelties included in the programme. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture opened the concert, and after the intermission came three numbers from Berlioz's "The Damnation of Faust," of which the "Waltz of the Sylphs" was especially effective. C. M. Loeffler, the soloist of the evening, played a composition of his own, including a "Preambule," "Eclogue" and "Carnaval des Morts." Mr. Loeffler is a player in the first violin group in the orchestra. His work was admirable, the composition making no slight demands upon the resources of the soloist.

The "Eclogue" was characterized by skilful use of solo and orchestra in turn and by some novel effects in harp accompaniment. The "Carnaval des Morts" was a series of variations on the theme of the "Dies Iræ" The second novelty was the "Gaelic" symphony by Mrs. Beach, another Bostonian. Its four movements were picturesque and spontaneous. Especially the "Alla Siciliana" and the "Lento" were heartily applauded. Delicacy was the pronounced characteristic, but there was no indefiniteness about this woman's composition. The "Finale" was all that its name required, entirely free of any suggestion of a postscript. The third novelty was the work of a living Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Here were illustrated in tone-colors three stories of "Scheherazade." The story teller appeared in a free use of solo passages in all the various voices of the orchestra. Mr. Kneisel played the parts assigned to a single violin. His tone was exquisite in the "Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess." The suite ended brilliantly with the "Sinking of Sinbad's Ship."

The [illegible] Telegram.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1898.

CHOICE of novelties for the fourth concert of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA last night at the Metropolitan Opera House was rather unfortunate. The "first time" numbers reminded us all too much of an orchestral legerdemain performance. There were startling tricks, but the audience missed the predominance of the good, solid music that Mr. Emil Paur is accustomed to play at these concerts. Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and Hector Berlioz's "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Waltz of the Sylphs" and Rakocay's march, which are familiar, were enjoyed most. It all goes to show that the masters are in no immediate danger of being relegated.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler played his own composition, "Divertimento," for violin and orchestra, in A minor, for the first time in these concerts. In this work, which is still in manuscript, the composer gives his favorite instrument every advantage, and gives himself the opportunity to display his fine technique, good tone and his thoroughly musicianly phrasing. The applause which he received was as much for the artist as the composer. Another novelty was the symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, an American composer, who is best known through her songs. The composition shows that she has made exhaustive studies in counterpoint and instrumentation, but does not display any great originality. The themes are old friends dressed in new attire. There is a lack of substantiality in the first movement. In the second movement the Beckmesser motive in the "Meistersinger" crops out all too plainly. The third movement is the most strongly marked in Gaelic character and is most originally treated. The development of this movement is elaborate. The last movement dropped back into uncertainty of form. It lacked foundation. Variations are resorted to to cover lack of invention. The instrumentation of the symphony is graceful.

The third novelty, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35, was of decidedly descriptive character, and savored strongly of the East. It purposes to tell of Sinbad's festival at Bagdad and his destruction at sea. The wave motive in the first movement was admirably worked out and was superbly rendered. The third movement, the "Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess," is in a plain romanza form. The fourth movement gave Mr. Franz Kneisel, with the solo violin, an opportunity to show his remarkable virtuosity.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme offered by Mr. Paur at the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening was a feast of good things, though surprising by his departure from his custom of opening with the symphony. The five numbers included three important novelties: one, a divertimento for violin and orchestra, the work of C. M. Loeffler, the soloist of the evening and a regular member of the orchestra; another, a symphony in E minor, entitled "Gaelic," the work of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, wife of one of Boston's foremost physicians, and a composer of such fertility that this symphony figures as Opus 32 in a list of nearly seventy works which she has written since 1885; the third, a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Besides these, there were Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the dainty minuet and waltz and stirring march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

The second of the four movements of the Rimsky-Korsakoff selection was omitted, perhaps because of the length of the concert, but the three movements given showed the composer to be a man of great strength and originality, the third being also notable for its grace. Mr. Loeffler's work was admirable both as composer and performer, and he well deserved the plaudits bestowed upon him, not only at the end of his own number, but when he reappeared later to take his accustomed seat among the violins. The second movement of his divertimento was especially delightful. Mrs. Beach's symphony is a work of so high excellence that the coupling of her name with those of Beethoven and Berlioz, though at first favoring slightly of presumption, seemed later a matter of course. But the first and fourth movements are distinctly inferior to the second and third, which were full of lovely melody elaborated with marvellous skill. In our opinion, Mr. Paur's concerts would be still more enjoyable if he did not rush his band at race-horse speed. Before one can pass a restful word of comment to his neighbor on the character of the movement just concluded, the tap of the baton summons the players to attention, and off they are again.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Thursday night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The following tremendous program was presented:

Overture to Egmont, Op. 84............Van Beethoven
Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra in A minor, Op. 9 (MS.)......................Loeffler
  Preambule: Allegro (A minor).
  Eglogue: Andante (F major).
  Carnaval des Morts: Variations on the Theme "Dies Irae," Moderato (A minor).
    (First time at these concerts.)
Symphony in E minor, Gaelic, Op. 32...........Beach
  Allegro con fuoco (E minor).
  Alla Siciliana (F major).
  Allegro vivace (F major).
  Lento con molto espressione (E minor).
  Finale: Allegro molto (E minor).
    (First time at these concerts.)
From The Damnation of Faust, Op. 24.........Berlioz
  Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.
  Waltz of Sylphs.
  Rakoczy March.
Symphonic Suite, Scheherazade, Op. 35. Rimsky-Korsakoff
  The Sea and Sinbad's Ship:
    Largo maestoso.—Allegro non troppo.
  The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess: Andantino quasi allegretto.
  Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sinbad's Ship:
    Allegro molto e frenetico.—Vivo.—Allegro.
    (First time at these concerts.)
    Soloist, C. M. Loeffler.

The program was too long by at least two numbers. Mr. Paur might easily have omitted the overture and the Berlioz music and let Boston hold its own against Russia. A new symphony, a new symphonic suite and a new suite for violin—that is novelty with a vengeance. But as there was much good music and much good playing it would be sheer ingratitude to complain. The Loeffler Divertimento proved to be a charming and scholarly diversion of one of the most original musical thinkers in the country. Mr. Loeffler is a member of the orchestra—what orchestra at home or abroad can boast such virtuosi?—and his music is written with a perfect comprehension of the solo instrument and the orchestra. Fancy a Paganini who has read Maeterlinck; fancy an imagination fantastic and slightly strained in the path of the morbid; fancy perfect musicianship, a delicate sense of color, values and a sense of the grotesque; fancy all these things and you have not yet grasped the half of Loeffler's music. The Bach-like preambule, the pastoral sweetness of the eclogue and the ironic fantasy and audacious technical display of the last movement provoked the inquiry—besides Richard Strauss, who is there in Europe, who could write such music, such modern music? The scoring of the accompanying sections and the tutti is a marvel of discretion of the seldom practiced tact of omission. Then, to top it all, the composer played the difficult violin solo and played it with consummate taste, feeling and brilliancy. He was recalled again and again, and later in the evening when he resumed his seat beside Mr. Kneisel he was given a most edifying and spontaneous round of applause.

The symphony of Mrs. Beach is too long, too strenuously worked over and attempts too much. Its composer is a Boston lady of musical ability, a pianist, and the possessor of a good memory. Almost every modern composer has left a trace in her score, which, in its efforts to be Gaelic and masculine ends in being monotonous and spasmodic. The second movement is the most unfeigned, although the first starts out bravely enough and the last, which contains good material, is spun out. The slow movement is unqualifiedly tiresome, for the composer never knows when to stop. Mrs. Beach scores with a generous eye for color, and that color soon becomes cloying. What she says in her work has been said a thousand times before, and better said, yet there is no gainsaying her industry, her gift for melody—even "Du lieben Augustine" is not forgotten—and her lack of logic. Contrapuntally she is not strong. Of grace and delicacy there are evidences in the Siciliana, and there she is at her best, "but yet a woman."

There are, however, many men spoiling music paper who cannot begin to master the technics of composition as well as Mrs. Beach.

The slow movement of the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite was omitted. The entire work has been played in Brooklyn. It is not great music, but it is clever, entertaining and highly descriptive. The narration, beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel, the Oriental clangor of the Bagdad Festival, the shipwreck—all these were striking, indeed sensational. Rimsky-Korsakoff is now past middle life, is an amateur—his wife being rich—and is at the head of the new movement in Russian music. His characteristics are bold modulation, absolute freedom in from, a highly specialized sense for orchestration and the selection of romantic subjects for treatment. Liszt is the father of the school. All the music of the program was brilliantly interpreted by Mr. Paur and his men.

The Boston Symphony concerts were of course the notable affairs, the "Tannhäuser" production following.

The way Paur is growing among the people is something remarkable and something which cannot be overlooked, but must invite comment. The people of Brooklyn are conservative, even to a painful degree, but this man has commanded the admiration of the most critical; indeed, the greater the critic the more his admiration and respect for this conductor. There was much delight expressed at the announcement in THE MUSICAL COURIER that Paur was to remain in this country with the Boston Symphony, and the next season promises to be a brilliant one with him at the baton.

The matinee concert was well attended, and again the young people were out in full force. It is evident that the program was selected with them in view, as it was rather lighter than the usual Boston Symphony program, containing the "Ruy Blas" overture and the Delibes' "Sylvia" suite. In justice to the audience I will state, however, that the Beethoven "Pastorale Symphony" received almost as much applause as Delibes.

The soloists were Mme. Marie Barna, soprano, and T Adamowski, violinist. Mme. Barna sang Foote's "Love Me if I Live," a song of Grieg, and a beautiful number of Weil's, in which she had the violin obligato of Adamowski. Madame Barna was at her best in the last named.

Adamowski played beautifully, his Beethoven "Romanza," however, showing rather more suavity than Beethoven requires, and in the Paganini number his intonation was not always flawless, but on the whole his playing was full of charm and interest.

At the evening concert there were two great numbers. Probably no one present will ever forget that presentation of Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, which was brought out in the most perfect manner conceivable. The soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, who played a concerto for 'cello by C. M. Loeffler, one of the numbers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose name as composer is not unfamilar. Loeffler was surely fortunate in having his work presented in so magnificent a manner as it was by Schroeder and the Boston Symphony. When a man writes with the knowledge that he will receive such a presentation, what is there left for him to desire?

Loeffler is talented; the concerts left no room for doubt of that. There was much display of originality, especially in form, the five movements being connected without the usual intervening waits, and all the changes of tempo, style and key are arrived at with the utmost ease, and yet are absolutely and pronouncedly distinct. That the interest of the audience can be held through such a supposed strain is in itself enough to stamp the composition as good. The closing number was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was a delightful forerunner to the next concert, which will be a Wagnerian program, and the last of the season.

For a Permanent Orchestra.

Col. Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a talk to a number of those interested in forming a permanent orchestra under Mr. Seidl's direction, in this city, at the residence of Mr. Gustav E. Kissel, No. 15 West Sixteenth street, yesterday afternoon.

To Mr. Henry Villard, who afterward asked if, in establishing an orchestra here, it would be well to form a corporation with limited liability, Colonel Higginson replied:

"Decidedly no! You don't want a corporation, or even a company. Let five or six people get together and furnish a fund of $25,000. That's ample to start on. Then concentrate your authority. You must appoint one man whose word is law. The musicians will want to growl to someone over the conductor's head. It will be part of your appointee's duty to hear the musicians' growl, and then tell them as pleasantly as possible that the conductor's right—even when he's wrong.

"As to the size of the orchestra," continued Colonel Higginson, "you will want from twenty to twenty-five wind instruments. The number of strings will depend upon the size of your hall and the amount of noise you want to make—thirty-two violins, I should say, and the balance of the string band in proportion.

"Your conductor should have the making of programs and the selection of soloists, though the engagements of the latter should, on account of the expense involved, be submitted to your representative. But you'll usually find that as corner lots cost most, the very soloists you have to pay highest for are those you want most.

"Someone has spoken of my liberality. Why liberality? The best use you can put money to is to spend it. Some men spend their money on cigars, some on yachts. My tastes simply lead me to spend mine on music."

Maurice Grau, after Colonel Higginson had concluded, said that if a permanent orchestra under Mr. Seidl were formed he would be glad to negotiate for its services during the opera season, but that, of course, the orchestra would be able to give only very few concerts so long as the opera lasted.

THIS is from yesterday's Herald. No orchestra can succeed artistically as a permanent orchestra that is, at the same time, an opera orchestra. The two functions neutralize each other for reasons easily understood.—ED. M. C.

The Evening Telegram.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1898.

CHOICE of novelties for the fourth concert of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA last night at the Metropolitan Opera House was rather unfortunate. The "first time" numbers reminded us all too much of an orchestral legerdemain performance. There were startling tricks, but the audience missed the predominance of the good, solid music that Mr. Emil Paur is accustomed to play at these concerts. Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and Hector Berlioz's "Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps," "Waltz of the Sylphs" and Rakoczy's march, which are familiar, were enjoyed most. It all goes to show that the masters are in no immediate danger of being relegated.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler played his own composition, "Divertimento," for violin and orchesra, in A minor, for the first time in these concerts. In this work, which is still in manuscript, the composer gives his favorite instrument every advantage, and gives himself the opportunity to display his fine technique, good tone and his thoroughly musicianly phrasing. The applause which he received was as much for the artist as the composer. Another novelty was the symphony in E minor, "Gaelic," by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, an American composer, who is best known through her songs. The composition shows that she has made exhaustive studies in counterpoint and instrumentation, but does not display any great originality. The themes are old friends dressed in new attire. There is a lack of substantiality in the first movement. In the second movement the Beckmesser motive in the "Meistersinger" crops out all too plainly. The third movement is the most strongly marked in Gaelic character and is most originally treated. The development of this movement is elaborate. The last movement dropped back into uncertainty of form. It lacked foundation. Variations are resorted to to cover lack of invention. The instrumentation of the symphony is graceful.

The third novelty, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35, was of decidedly descriptive character, and savored strongly of the East. It purposes to tell of Sinbad's festival at Bagdad and his destruction at sea. The wave motive in the first movement was admirably worked out and was superbly rendered. The third movement, the "Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess," is in a plain romanza form. The fourth movement gave Mr. Franz Kneisel, with the solo violin, an opportunity to show his remarkable virtuosity.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme offered by Mr. Paur at the Metropolitan Opera House last Thursday evening was a feast of good things, though surprising by his departure from his custom of opening with the symphony. The five numbers included three important novelties: one, a divertimento for violin and orchestra, the work of C. M. Loeffler, the soloist of the evening and a regular member of the orchestra; another, a symphony in E minor, entitled "Gaelic," the work of Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, wife of one of Boston's foremost physicians, and a composer of such fertility that this symphony figures as Opus 32 in a list of nearly seventy works which she has written since 1885; the third, a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff. Besides these, there were Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, and the dainty minuet and waltz and stirring march from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

The second of the four movements of the Rimsky-Korsakoff selection was omitted, perhaps because of the length of the concert, but the three movements given showed the composer to be a man of great strength and originality, the third being also notable for its grace. Mr. Loeffler's work was admirable both as composer and performer, and he well deserved the plaudits bestowed upon him, not only at the end of his own number, but when he reappeared later to take his accustomed seat among the violins. The second movement of his divertimento was especially delightful. Mrs. Beach's symphony is a work of so high excellence that the coupling of her name with those of Beethoven and Berlioz, though at first favoring slightly of presumption, seemed later a matter of course. But the first and fourth movements are distinctly inferior to the second and third, which were full of lovely melody elaborated with marvellous skill. In our opinion, Mr. Paur's concerts would be still more enjoyable if he did not rush his band at race-horse speed. Before one can pass a restful word of comment to his neighbor on the character of the movement just concluded, the tap of the baton summons the players to attention, and off they are again.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1898.

Boston Symphony Concert.

THE fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last Thursday night at the Metropolitan Opera House. The following tremendous program was presented:

Overture to Egmont, Op. 84............Van Beethoven
Divertimento for Violin and Orchestra in A minor, Op. 9 (MS.)........................Loeffler
  Preambule: Allegro (A minor).
  Eglogue: Andante (F major).
  Carnaval des Morts: Variations on the Theme "Dies Irae," Moderato (A minor).
    (First time at these concerts.)
Symphony in E minor, Gaelic, Op. 32...........Beach
  Allegro con fuoco (E minor).
  Alla Siciliana (F major).
  Allegro vivace (F major).
  Lento con molto espressione (E minor).
  Finale: Allegro molto (E minor).
    (First time at these concerts.)
From The Damnation of Faust, Op. 24.........Berlioz
  Minuet of Will-o'-the-Wisps.
  Waltz of Sylphs.
  Rakoczy March.
Symphonic Suite, Scheherazade, Op. 35. Rimsky-Korsakoff
  The Sea and Sinbad's Ship:
    Largo maestoso.—Allegro non troppo.
  The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess: Andantino quasi allegretto.
  Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sinbad's Ship:
    Allegro molto e frenetico.—Vivo.—Allegro.
    (First time at these concerts.)
    Soloist, C. M. Loeffler.

The program was too long by at least two numbers. Mr. Paur might easily have omitted the overture and the Berlioz music and let Boston hold its own against Russia. A new symphony, a new symphonic suite and a new suite for violin—that is novelty with a vengeance. But as there was much good music and much good playing it would be sheer ingratitude to complain. The Loeffler Divertimento proved to be a charming and scholarly diversion of one of the most original musical thinkers in the country. Mr. Loeffler is a member of the orchestra—what orchestra at home or abroad can boast such virtuosi?—and his music is written with a perfect comprehension of the solo instrument and the orchestra. Fancy a Paganini who has read Maeterlinck; fancy an imagination fantastic and slightly strained in the path of the morbid; fancy perfect musicianship, a delicate sense of color, values and a sense of the grotesque; fancy all these things and you have not yet grasped the half of Loeffler's music. The Bach-like preambule, the pastoral sweetness of the eclogue and the ironic fantasy and audacious technical display of the last movement provoked the inquiry—besides Richard Strauss, who is there in Europe, who could write such music, such modern music? The scoring of the accompanying sections and the tutti is a marvel of discretion of the seldom practiced tact of omission. Then, to top it all, the composer played the difficult violin solo and played it with consummate taste, feeling and brilliancy. He was recalled again and again, and later in the evening when he resumed his seat beside Mr. Kneisel he was given a most edifying and spontaneous round of applause.

The symphony of Mrs. Beach is too long, too strenuously worked over and attempts too much. Its composer is a Boston lady of musical ability, a pianist, and the possessor of a good memory. Almost every modern composer has left a trace in her score, which, in its efforts to be Gaelic and masculine ends in being monotonous and spasmodic. The second movement is the most unfeigned, although the first starts out bravely enough and the last, which contains good material, is spun out. The slow movement is unqualifiedly tiresome, for the composer never knows when to stop. Mrs. Beach scores with a generous eye for color, and that color soon becomes cloying. What she says in her work has been said a thousand times before, and better said, yet there is no gainsaying her industry, her gift for melody—even "Du lieben Augustine" is not forgotten—and her lack of logic. Contrapuntally she is not strong. Of grace and delicacy there are evidences in the Siciliana, and there she is at her best, "but yet a woman."

There are, however, many men spoiling music paper who cannot begin to master the technics of composition as well as Mrs. Beach.

The slow movement of the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite was omitted. The entire work has been played in Brooklyn. It is not great music, but it is clever, entertaining and highly descriptive. The narration, beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel, the Oriental clangor of the Bagdad Festival, the shipwreck—all these were striking, indeed sensational. Rimsky-Korsakoff is now past middle life, is an amateur—his wife being rich—and is at the head of the new movement in Russian music. His characteristics are bold modulation, absolute freedom in from, a highly specialized sense for orchestration and the selection of romantic subjects for treatment. Liszt is the father of the school. All the music of the program was brilliantly interpreted by Mr. Paur and his men.

The Boston Symphony concerts were of course the notable affairs, the "Tannhäuser" production following.

The way Paur is growing among the people is something remarkable and something which cannot be overlooked, but must invite comment. The people of Brooklyn are conservative, even to a painful degree, but this man has commanded the admiration of the most critical; indeed, the greater the critic the more his admiration and respect for this conductor. There was much delight expressed at the announcement in THE MUSICAL COURIER that Paur was to remain in this country with the Boston Symphony, and the next season promises to be a brilliant one with him at the baton.

The matinee concert was well attended, and again the young people were out in full force. It is evident that the program was selected with them in view, as it was rather lighter than the usual Boston Symphony program, containing the "Ruy Blas" overture and the Delibes' "Sylvia" suite. In justice to the audience I will state, however, that the Beethoven "Pastorale Symphony" received almost as much applause as Delibes.

The soloists were Mme. Marie Barna, soprano, and T Adamowski, violinist. Mme. Barna sang Foote's "Love Me if I Live," a song of Grieg, and a beautiful number of Weil's, in which she had the violin obligato of Adamowski. Madame Barna was at her best in the last named.

Adamowski played beautifully, his Beethoven "Romanza," however, showing rather more suavity than Beethoven requires, and in the Paganini number his intonation was not always flawless, but on the whole his playing was full of charm and interest.

At the evening concert there were two great numbers. Probably no one present will ever forget that presentation of Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony, which was brought out in the most perfect manner conceivable. The soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, who played a concerto for 'cello by C. M. Loeffler, one of the numbers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose name as composer is not unfamilar. Loeffler was surely fortunate in having his work presented in so magnificent a manner as it was by Schroeder and the Boston Symphony. When a man writes with the knowledge that he will receive such a presentation, what is there left for him to desire?

Loeffler is talented; the concerts left no room for doubt of that. There was much display of originality, especially in form, the five movements being connected without the usual intervening waits, and all the changes of tempo, style and key are arrived at with the utmost ease, and yet are absolutely and pronouncedly distinct. That the interest of the audience can be held through such a supposed strain is in itself enough to stamp the composition as good. The closing number was the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," which was a delightful forerunner to the next concert, which will be a Wagnerian program, and the last of the season.

For a Permanent Orchestra.

Col. Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a talk to a number of those interested in forming a permanent orchestra under Mr. Seidl's direction, in this city, at the residence of Mr. Gustav E. Kissel, No. 15 West Sixteenth street, yesterday afternoon.

To Mr. Henry Villard, who afterward asked if, in establishing an orchestra here, it would be well to form a corporation with limited liability, Colonel Higginson replied:

"Decidedly no! You don't want a corporation, or even a company. Let five or six people get together and furnish a fund of $25,000. That's ample to start on. Then concentrate your authority. You must appoint one man whose word is law. The musicians will want to growl to someone over the conductor's head. It will be part of your appointee's duty to hear the musicians' growl, and then tell them as pleasantly as possible that the conductor's right—even when he's wrong.

"As to the size of the orchestra," continued Colonel Higginson, "you will want from twenty to twenty-five wind instruments. The number of strings will depend upon the size of your hall and the amount of noise you want to make—thirty-two violins, I should say, and the balance of the string band in proportion.

"Your conductor should have the making of programs and the selection of soloists, though the engagements of the latter should, on account of the expense involved, be submitted to your representative. But you'll usually find that as corner lots cost most, the very soloists you have to pay highest for are those you want most.

"Someone has spoken of my liberality. Why liberality? The best use you can put money to is to spend it. Some men spend their money on cigars, some on yachts. My tastes simply lead me to spend mine on music."

Maurice Grau, after Colonel Higginson had concluded, said that if a permanent orchestra under Mr. Seidl were formed he would be glad to negotiate for its services during the opera season, but that, of course, the orchestra would be able to give only very few concerts so long as the opera lasted.

THIS is from yesterday's Herald. No orchestra can succeed artistically as a permanent orchestra that is, at the same time, an opera orchestra. The two functions neutralize each other for reasons easily understood.—ED. M. C.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIII., NO. 58.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Unusually Varied List of Selections Given.

The Overture and the Symphony, Beautifully Played, the Only Important Works of the Evening—Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Schulz the Soloists.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "For the Consecration of the House," op. 124..................Beethoven
Recitative, "Ne' trofei d'Alessandro," and aria, "Lusinghe piu care," from "Alessandro"..........................Handel
Cantilena for violoncello..........Goltermann
"Dance of Sylphs," for violoncello.....Popper
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.... Schumann
Elaine's song, "Sweet Is True Love"....Foote
Irish folk song..........................Foote
Ballet music from "The Demon"....Rubinstein

The soloists were Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz, and Mr. Foote played the accompaniments to his own songs.

As will be seen, the selections were extremely miscellaneous, the overture and the symphony being the only important works. The symphony was gloriously read, and as beautifully performed. In fact, its performance, in precision, color, freedom and brilliancy, may be given a place among the best successes of the Symphony season.

The overture, not one of the composer's most interesting and effective efforts in its class, had a perfect performance. Almost any other of his overtures would have been more welcome, but this one had not been given in some years, and was probably chosen on that account.

The two Rubinstein dances, so full of character and so piquant in their rhythmic accent, and so bright and graceful in their orchestration, were well worth hearing again, not only for their melodic charm, but for the sympathetic manner in which they were interpreted.

The solos were light, and also well enough in their way; but it would seem that Mrs. Henschel might have refrained from the Handel aria to which she has clung for so many years, and in which she has been heard here so often; not that it is less interesting than it has ever been, but because one may have too much even of a good thing. Then, too, her singing of it is not as flexible, as effortless, and as tuneful as it has been in the past; and the time has come to her, as it must come to every singer, when the voice becomes worn and tired from constant use, and when care must be taken to present only the good points that remain to it.

The two excellent songs by Mr. Foote are familiar, and have met with much and deserved favor; but why sing them at a symphony concert, after they have borne the brunt of many a song recital, and one of them, at least, having been given by the singer at the recent entertainment of this order, in which she has appeared? Both songs, however, were daintily sung, the Irish folk-song particularly so. Mrs. Henschel was welcomed with great friendliness, and was recalled frequently, and with fervent enthusiasm, after each appearance.

Mr. Schulz's selections were light and tuneful, after the well known Gottermann-Popperesque formula. They were pleasing enough after their fashion, and were ably and gracefully played and with that artistic freedom of style that is always an attractive feature of the artist's solo work. He also received a cordial recognition, a warm tribute of plaudits, and, of course, the recalls upon which a soloist may confidently count when he has pleased his audience.

The programme for the next concert is three movements of Beethoven's 9th symphony; his overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Saint-Saens' concerto No. 4, for piano, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture. The soloist is to be Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, MR. NEVIN, ETC.

In making up his sixteenth programme Mr. Paur apparently thought that people would be too busy with opera music to wish to apply themselves to the consideration of anything in his line which might require grave attention as new, or even unfamiliar. So he set Schumann's fourth symphony in the middle, and arranged about it an assorted variety of short selections of which one only—Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture—had depth or solidity, the orchestra's final number being the rather picturceque ballet music from Rubinstein's "Daemon." Mr. Schulz had a pair of almost trivial 'cello solos—a sentimental "Cantilena" by Golterman, and a dainty "Dance of Sylphs" by Popper, which he played artistically of course, the one with grace and the other with dexterity. Two other places were filled by Mrs. Henschel, who sang with orchestra a florid scene from Handel's "Alessandro," and to the pianoforte Elaine's song in Tennyson's idyl and an Irish folk song, both by Mr. Arthur Foote. Her voice was full, fresh and fair in quality, her execution (particularly its trills) clear-cut, and her tenderness of expression great in the two songs. Of these the second had the more color and value, the first seeming labored and the weight of its phrases being sometimes cast against the emphatic word instead of with it. The orchestra played excellently—barring too many solos on the kettle-drums,—and Mr. Foote accompanied his songs tastefully.

The next programme will be this: Beethoven, Three Movements of the Ninth Symphony; Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Saint-Saens, Concerto to Pianoforte, No. 4; Berlioz, Overture, "Carnaval Romain." Soloist, Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

From "La Traviata" in the afternoon, to Schumann's D minor symphony in the evening might have been rather a sharp contrast, but the edge was broken by a few short and popular works between, for the programme on Saturday, in Music Hall, was not made up of long and severe works, but dealt in pretty and easily comprehended numbers.

It began with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture (so-called from its having been used for the inauguration of a theatre in Vienna), a work which, in the earliest days of the Symphony Orchestra, was played regularly at the beginning of each season as a musical means of saying grace.

It was very clearly given, a classical performance of a classical work, although it is certainly not comparable to some of the greater overtures of Beethoven. The brasses were allowed to indulge in unmitigated power and the kettle-drummer thoroughly earned his salary, too, but the tumult of festivity was in place here.

Mrs. Henschel then appeared in "Lusinghe piu Care," from Handel's "Alessandro," with considerable flexibility but with rather light tone for Music Hall. This singer is at her best only in the closer intimacy of the chamber concert; she can no more transform herself into a symphony-concert singer than a violet can change itself into a sunflower.

This was strongly shown in the singing of two very dainty songs by Mr. Arthur Foote, and accompanied by the composer, songs which would have been altogether charming in Steinert Hall but which lost their delicate flavor in the large auditorium about as much as Chateau Yquem would if served in a soup-tureen. Yet the two songs, "Elaine's Song" and an Irish Folk-song, were sweetly given and both singer and composer were recalled several times with some enthusiasm.

Mr. Leo Schulz followed the Handelian number with two short selections for violoncello, both (also) somewhat short of symphony-concert dignity. In Goltermann's "Cantilena" the artist gave a rich, sympathetic tone, broad bowing, and proved himself a master of expression; in Popper's "Danse des Sylphes" he presented the expected exhibition of virtuosity and the sylphs aforesaid skipped brilliantly from the C to the A string and back again.

Mr. Schultz was also greeted with deserved applause and proved that which needed no proof, that he is a great and versatile artist, but one may hope for greater works when he next appears at a symphony concert.

Now came the ever-beautiful Schumann symphony in D minor, not a very austere work but full of tender and poetic thought, the product of the happiest period in the composer's life (and, the opposite of Schubert in this, he always wrote best when he was happiest) and one of his most characteristic orchestral works.

Spite of the revision which this work underwent before it reached its present shape, one cannot but perceive in some of its measures how much Schumann was influenced by his years of piano study; many of its touches of development suggest the chords and arpeggios of the piano.

The work was given with a perfect conception of its beauties; the Allegro had abundant spirit but was not overforced; the strong contrasts of the Scherzo, its strong accents, its syncopations, were given with fitting caprice; the violoncello melody of the Romanza was of utmost tenderness; the combat and strife pictured in the finale was also well caught up, its dissonances given with a fiery boldness as one might resolutely grasp a nettle and the triumph portrayed in the Coda lost nothing in this fine interpretation.

It was a very syncopated girl that appeared in the ballet-music from Rubinstein's "Demon," which closed the concert. There was a picturesque monotony through the two numbers and a degree of Oriental brooding that may have suggested the Midway Plaisance in some degree, but was very attractive nevertheless.

Such a couple of numbers of ballet-music were just the right ending for a programme that was not ascetic in any part, and such a programme was of just the right sort for a concert during the opera season, when the couple of thousand people who constitute "Musical Boston" are apt to be a little surfeited with the tonal banquet.

Next Saturday, however, the Beethoven star is to be in the ascendant, and three movements of the ninth symphony are to be given, as well as the greatest of the "Leonora" overtures. Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixteenth of the regular series of Symphony concerts was given last evening in Music Hall. The orchestral selections were Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House." Schumann's D minor Symphony No. 4, and the ballet music from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon." The soloists were Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz, 'cellist.

At the next concert, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist, will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 27, 1898.

Interesting Symphony Program.

A program of more than usual Symphony proportions—and of more varied interest than usual, too—was presented by Mr Paur last week, and yet the performance occupied less time than that required for the average concert of the series. Possibly the unusual enthusiasm of the crowded company of auditors may be due, in some measure, to the nature of the offering.

There were two soloists. Each was no small success. Mrs Georg Henschel, who is as far from being "without honor" in her own city as she is from being unappreciated wherever she has sung in public, was received with a pleasant show of friendliness. As those who have been privileged to attend the Henschels' song recitals the present season well know, she has lost nothing of that charm of manner and sincerity in interpretation which have characterized from the first her work on the concert stage.

While the Handel air, "Lusinghe piu care," with its embellishments, was given with care and good effect, the impression made by this undeniably artificial as well as classic selection was as nothing in comparison with that created by her interpretation of Mr Arthur Foote's "Sweet is True Love" and "Irish Folk Song." Here Mrs Henschel's power of getting at the very heart of a song and setting forth with dainty appreciation its fullest meaning were in delightful evidence. The artiste was recalled with genuine enthusiasm. Mr Foote, who played the accompaniment for his songs, shared with her the plaudits of the assemblage. He was fortunate indeed in having such an interpreter.

A brace of violoncello solos gave to Mr Leo Schulz his opportunities as soloist—opportunities which he put to effective use. "The Dance of Sylphs," by Popper, amply displayed his virtuosity, but we are inclined to think that most of the audience appreciated the fact that Mr Schulz' skill and artistic feeling found worthier expression in the Goltermann cantilena. Both selections were warmly applauded.

The symphony of the week was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor, and it seemed as if the orchestra were dominated by a spirit of peculiarly keen appreciation of its not unfamiliar beauties, so well were they presented. One can scarcely praise too much the masterly way in which the varying moods of the great composer were set forth, and it is a satisfaction to note the abundant evidence of public appreciation.

Beethoven's overture, "For the Consecration of the house," opened the program, as it has opened not a few other programs at Symphony concerts. For a closing offering one had the strikingly bizarre but effective ballet music from "The Demon" of Rubinstein, taxing severely the alertness as well as skill of the players, who honored every draft made upon them.

This is the attractive offering for the rehearsal and concert the present week: Beethoven, three movements of the ninth symphony; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, Mme Bloomfield-Zeisler; Berlioz, overture, "A Carnival in Rome."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1898.

The program of the 16th Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "For the Consecration of the House"............................. Beethoven
Recitative and aria, "Lusinghe piu care," from "Alessandro"............Handel
Cantilena for 'cello.................Goltermann
"Dance of Sylphs," for 'cello.............Popper
Symphony No 4, in D minor..........Schumann
Songs with piano, "Sweet Is True Love," Irish Folk-song..................Foote
Ballet music from "The Demon..Rubinstein

Mr. Apthrop says in the program book of last night, "Coussemaker came out a year or two ago with a bulky volume, proving by carefully collected documents that Gregory the Great had next to nothing, if anything at all, to do with the establishment of the 'Gregorian' Chaunt."

Charles Edmond Henri de Coussemaker was in some respects a remarkable man, but he was not as remarkable as Mr. Apthorp would have us believe.

For Coussemaker died in 1876.

***

The dry and formal overture was anatomically well played. Not even this praise can be awarded to the performance of the symphony. The first movement was rough and confused; the romanze was for once without poetry; the scherzo with its marvelously beautiful trio was beat out in perfunctory cut-and-dried fashion; and the finale was without elasticity or swing. There has not been such a prosaic performance of this nobly melancholy and haunting work in Music Hall for nine years.

There are some that object to the ballet music from "The Demon" in a Symphony concert. I cannot sympathize with this objection, but I well understand how any one may reasonably protest against 'cello pieces by Goltermann and Popper, and songs with piano accompaniment in a concert of this nature. The Cantilena is, in its place, a pretty piece, and in German beer gardens conversation is hushed while it is performed. The "Dance of Sylphs" may well arouse applause at a concert, where the names of "eminent artists" are printed in exceedingly large type on the program. These pieces, however, are beneath the dignity of a Symphony concert. Mr. Schulz played them well enough, but I am surprised that he chose them, and I am still more surprised that Mr. Paur allowed them to be played.

Mrs. Henschel, a skillful cutter of vocal cameos in a small hall, does not give the same pleasure in a large one. She might have spared us the aria from "Alessandro," for she has sung it here before, and there are tunes with orchestra that we have not heard and are worth singing. And if she insisted on singing songs with piano accompaniment was it necessary for her to pay tribute to parochialism? The genteel parlor folk song of Mr. Foote is no novelty, and Mrs. Henschel found in it nothing new.

Philip Hale.

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, "The Consecration of the House".. Beethoven
Recitative and Aria from "Alessandro".Handel
Cantilena for Violoncello..........Goltermann
"Dance of Sylphs," for Violincello......Popper
Symphony No. 4, D minor, Op. 120..Schumann
Elaine's Song...................................
Irish Folk Song..................Arthur Foote
Ballet music from "The Demon"..Rubinstein
Soloists, Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz.

This programme, like the appearance of the swallow and robin, indicates that the severities of winter have become things of the past, and that spring, with its etherial mildness is already upon us, at least in theory. In the midst of the old favorites one regrets to note the absence of the Carlo Broschi overture, Handel's "Sweet Bird" the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet" and one or two of Mr. Henschel's songs. The novelties introduced, however, demonstrate that Mr. Paur is still on the look out for evidences of local genius, and he cannot be too highly praised for the catholicity of his taste. This musical bouquet of fresh and early spring flowers is particularly welcome at the present time, both for its sweetness and as an example of dainty and cunning programme making. It was a great delight to again hear Mrs. Henschel, after her long absence from the Boston concert stage, and it demonstrates that Mr. Paur is as anxious for novelty as well as for rare artists.

Mr. Foote's songs are romantic rather than classic, but it is impossible on one brief hearing to discover the many beauties that justified their being sung at a symphony concert. The Goltermann Cantilena is a very sweet work, and it was very sweetly played by Mr. Schulz, who, in addition to his technical skill, put a very large amount of dainty delicacy in his work. Mr. Paur conducted the Rubinstein selection as if he had thoroughly mastered the beauties and esoteric mysteries of the work, and it is to be hoped that he will place this too little known work on his next miscellaneous programme. A musical hash is always appetizing if the materials are conscientiously and skilfully selected, and when the Symphony Orchestra deals out the toothsome fare the most exacting and pampered art appetite is satisfied.

At the next concert there will be given three movements from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, his overture No. 3 to Lenore, Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte No. 4, and Berlioz's "Carneval Romain." The soloists will be Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1898.

The program of the sixteenthSymphony concert (February 26) was as follows:

Overture, Zur Weihe des Hauses.............Beethoven
Recitative and Aria, Lusinghe piu care, from Alessandro ....Händel
Cantilena, for 'cello.......................Goltermann
Danse des Sylphes, for 'cello....................Popper
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.................Schumann
Songs with Piano................................Foote
Elaine's Song, Sweet is True Love.
Irish Folk-Song.
Ballet Music from Der Dämon...............Rubinstein

The overture, a dry and formal thing, was carefully dissected by Mr. Paur, with the aid of his merry men, but the wondrously beautiful symphony was played either clumsily or drily and without poetic feeling. Why did Mr. Schulz choose such 'cello pieces for his appearance at a symphony concert, and why Mr. Paur allow him to play them? Mrs. Henschel sang her accustomed Händelian aria in her accustomed fashion, and then paid tribute to parochialism by singing two affectedly naive songs of Mr. Foote, which were out of place in a concert of this character.

* * *

I was very sorry not to hear Mrs. Jacoby at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, the 24th. I was told by persons of authority that she charmed orchestra and audience by the sumptuousness of her voice and by her rare personal charms.

JACOBY
AND THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., February 26, 1898.

THE event in music of recent weeks was the appearance here on Thursday evening, the 24th, of Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, the celebrated contralto, who sang here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur, conductor.

Her songs were an aria from "Samson and Delilah" by Saint-Saëns, with orchestral accompaniment, and "Im Herbst," by Robert Franz, and "Frühlingsnacht," by Schumann, the latter songs being accompanied by Mr. Paur himself, something he rarely does at any of his concerts in Boston or anywhere.

No encores are permitted at our concerts here, but Mrs. Jacoby was recalled three times, and the members of the orchestra were among the most enthusiastic of all those who insisted upon recalls. She sang the Saint-Saëns aria with great volume of tone and poetic expression, and the two German songs were delivered with true inspiration. Mrs. Jacoby's voice is certainly a most remarkable musical organ, and she is sure to sing here again, judging from the effect she produced upon the audience. VINDEX.

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE, JANUARY 26.

Mrs. Jacoby gave great pleasure by her artistic singing, especially of the two songs. She received several recalls.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIII., NO. 58.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Unusually Varied List of Selections Given.

The Overture and the Symphony, Beautifully Played, the Only Important Works of the Evening—Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Schulz the Soloists.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "For the Consecration of the House," op. 124..................Beethoven
Recitative, "Ne' trofei d'Alessandro," and aria, "Lusinghe piu care," from "Alessandro"..........................Handel
Cantilena for violoncello..........Goltermann
"Dance of Sylphs," for violoncello.....Popper
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.... Schumann
Elaine's song, "Sweet Is True Love"....Foote
Irish folk song..........................Foote
Ballet music from "The Demon"....Rubinstein

The soloists were Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz, and Mr. Foote played the accompaniments to his own songs.

As will be seen, the selections were extremely miscellaneous, the overture and the symphony being the only important works. The symphony was gloriously read, and as beautifully performed. In fact, its performance, in precision, color, freedom and brilliancy, may be given a place among the best successes of the Symphony season.

The overture, not one of the composer's most interesting and effective efforts in its class, had a perfect performance. Almost any other of his overtures would have been more welcome, but this one had not been given in some years, and was probably chosen on that account.

The two Rubinstein dances, so full of character and so piquant in their rhythmic accent, and so bright and graceful in their orchestration, were well worth hearing again, not only for their melodic charm, but for the sympathetic manner in which they were interpreted.

The solos were light, and also well enough in their way; but it would seem that Mrs. Henschel might have refrained from the Handel aria to which she has clung for so many years, and in which she has been heard here so often; not that it is less interesting than it has ever been, but because one may have too much even of a good thing. Then, too, her singing of it is not as flexible, as effortless, and as tuneful as it has been in the past; and the time has come to her, as it must come to every singer, when the voice becomes worn and tired from constant use, and when care must be taken to present only the good points that remain to it.

The two excellent songs by Mr. Foote are familiar, and have met with much and deserved favor; but why sing them at a symphony concert, after they have borne the brunt of many a song recital, and one of them, at least, having been given by the singer at the recent entertainment of this order, in which she has appeared? Both songs, however, were daintily sung, the Irish folk-song particularly so. Mrs. Henschel was welcomed with great friendliness, and was recalled frequently, and with fervent enthusiasm, after each appearance.

Mr. Schulz's selections were light and tuneful, after the well known Gottermann-Popperesque formula. They were pleasing enough after their fashion, and were ably and gracefully played and with that artistic freedom of style that is always an attractive feature of the artist's solo work. He also received a cordial recognition, a warm tribute of plaudits, and, of course, the recalls upon which a soloist may confidently count when he has pleased his audience.

The programme for the next concert is three movements of Beethoven's 9th symphony; his overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Saint-Saens' concerto No. 4, for piano, and Berlioz's "Carnaval Romaine" overture. The soloist is to be Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, MR. NEVIN, ETC.

In making up his sixteenth programme Mr. Paur apparently thought that people would be too busy with opera music to wish to apply themselves to the consideration of anything in his line which might require grave attention as new, or even unfamiliar. So he set Schumann's fourth symphony in the middle, and arranged about it an assorted variety of short selections of which one only—Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture—had depth or solidity, the orchestra's final number being the rather picturceque ballet music from Rubinstein's "Daemon." Mr. Schulz had a pair of almost trivial 'cello solos—a sentimental "Cantilena" by Golterman, and a dainty "Dance of Sylphs" by Popper, which he played artistically of course, the one with grace and the other with dexterity. Two other places were filled by Mrs. Henschel, who sang with orchestra a florid scene from Handel's "Alessandro," and to the pianoforte Elaine's song in Tennyson's idyl and an Irish folk song, both by Mr. Arthur Foote. Her voice was full, fresh and fair in quality, her execution (particularly its trills) clear-cut, and her tenderness of expression great in the two songs. Of these the second had the more color and value, the first seeming labored and the weight of its phrases being sometimes cast against the emphatic word instead of with it. The orchestra played excellently—barring too many solos on the kettle-drums,—and Mr. Foote accompanied his songs tastefully.

The next programme will be this: Beethoven, Three Movements of the Ninth Symphony; Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Saint-Saens, Concerto to Pianoforte, No. 4; Berlioz, Overture, "Carnaval Romain." Soloist, Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 28, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

From "La Traviata" in the afternoon, to Schumann's D minor symphony in the evening might have been rather a sharp contrast, but the edge was broken by a few short and popular works between, for the programme on Saturday, in Music Hall, was not made up of long and severe works, but dealt in pretty and easily comprehended numbers.

It began with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture (so-called from its having been used for the inauguration of a theatre in Vienna), a work which, in the earliest days of the Symphony Orchestra, was played regularly at the beginning of each season as a musical means of saying grace.

It was very clearly given, a classical performance of a classical work, although it is certainly not comparable to some of the greater overtures of Beethoven. The brasses were allowed to indulge in unmitigated power and the kettle-drummer thoroughly earned his salary, too, but the tumult of festivity was in place here.

Mrs. Henschel then appeared in "Lusinghe piu Care," from Handel's "Alessandro," with considerable flexibility but with rather light tone for Music Hall. This singer is at her best only in the closer intimacy of the chamber concert; she can no more transform herself into a symphony-concert singer than a violet can change itself into a sunflower.

This was strongly shown in the singing of two very dainty songs by Mr. Arthur Foote, and accompanied by the composer, songs which would have been altogether charming in Steinert Hall but which lost their delicate flavor in the large auditorium about as much as Chateau Yquem would if served in a soup-tureen. Yet the two songs, "Elaine's Song" and an Irish Folk-song, were sweetly given and both singer and composer were recalled several times with some enthusiasm

Mr. Leo Schulz followed the Handelian number with two short selections for violoncello, both (also) somewhat short of symphony-concert dignity. In Goltermann's "Cantilena" the artist gave a rich, sympathetic tone, broad bowing, and proved himself a master of expression; in Popper's "Danse des Sylphes" he presented the expected exhibition of virtuosity and the sylphs aforesaid skipped brilliantly from the C to the A string and back again.

Mr. Schultz was also greeted with deserved applause and proved that which needed no proof, that he is a great and versatile artist, but one may hope for greater works when he next appears at a symphony concert.

Now came the ever-beautiful Schumann symphony in D minor, not a very austere work but full of tender and poetic thought, the product of the happiest period in the composer's life (and, the opposite of Schubert in this, he always wrote best when he was happiest) and one of his most characteristic orchestral works.

Spite of the revision which this work underwent before it reached its present shape, one cannot but perceive in some of its measures how much Schumann was influenced by his years of piano study; many of its touches of development suggest the chords and arpeggios of the piano.

The work was given with a perfect conception of its beauties; the Allegro had abundant spirit but was not overforced; the strong contrasts of the Scherzo, its strong accents, its syncopations, were given with fitting caprice; the violoncello melody of the Romanza was of utmost tenderness; the combat and strife pictured in the finale was also well caught up, its dissonances given with a fiery boldness as one might resolutely grasp a nettle and the triumph portrayed in the Coda lost nothing in this fine interpretation.

It was a very syncopated girl that appeared in the ballet-music from Rubinstein's "Demon," which closed the concert. There was a picturesque monotony through the two numbers and a degree of Oriental brooding that may have suggested the Midway Plaisance in some degree, but was very attractive nevertheless.

Such a couple of numbers of ballet-music were just the right ending for a programme that was not ascetic in any part, and such a programme was of just the right sort for a concert during the opera season, when the couple of thousand people who constitute "Musical Boston" are apt to be a little surfeited with the tonal banquet.

Next Saturday, however, the Beethoven star is to be in the ascendant, and three movements of the ninth symphony are to be given, as well as the greatest of the "Leonora" overtures. Louis C. Elson.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 27, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixteenth of the regular series of Symphony concerts was given last evening in Music Hall. The orchestral selections were Beethoven's overture, "The Dedication of the House." Schumann's D minor Symphony No. 4, and the ballet music from Rubinstein's opera, "The Demon." The soloists were Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz, 'cellist.

At the next concert, Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler, pianist, will be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB. 27, 1898.

Interesting Symphony Program.

A program of more than usual Symphony proportions—and of more varied interest than usual, too—was presented by Mr Paur last week, and yet the performance occupied less time than that required for the average concert of the series. Possibly the unusual enthusiasm of the crowded company of auditors may be due, in some measure, to the nature of the offering.

There were two soloists. Each was no small success. Mrs Georg Henschel, who is as far from being "without honor" in her own city as she is from being unappreciated wherever she has sung in public, was received with a pleasant show of friendliness. As those who have been privileged to attend the Henschels' song recitals the present season well know, she has lost nothing of that charm of manner and sincerity in interpretation which have characterized from the first her work on the concert stage.

While the Handel air, "Lusinghe piu care," with its embellishments, was given with care and good effect, the impression made by this undeniably artificial as well as classic selection was as nothing in comparison with that created by her interpretation of Mr Arthur Foote's "Sweet is True Love" and "Irish Folk Song." Here Mrs Henschel's power of getting at the very heart of a song and setting forth with dainty appreciation its fullest meaning were in delightful evidence. The artiste was recalled with genuine enthusiasm. Mr Foote, who played the accompaniment for his songs, shared with her the plaudits of the assemblage. He was fortunate indeed in having such an interpreter.

A brace of violoncello solos gave to Mr Leo Schulz his opportunities as soloist—opportunities which he put to effective use. "The Dance of Sylphs," by Popper, amply displayed his virtuosity, but we are inclined to think that most of the audience appreciated the fact that Mr Schulz' skill and artistic feeling found worthier expression in the Goltermann cantilena. Both selections were warmly applauded.

The symphony of the week was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor, and it seemed as if the orchestra were dominated by a spirit of peculiarly keen appreciation of its not unfamiliar beauties, so well were they presented. One can scarcely praise too much the masterly way in which the varying moods of the great composer were set forth, and it is a satisfaction to note the abundant evidence of public appreciation.

Beethoven's overture, "For the Consecration of the house," opened the program, as it has opened not a few other programs at Symphony concerts. For a closing offering one had the strikingly bizarre but effective ballet music from "The Demon" of Rubinstein, taxing severely the alertness as well as skill of the players, who honored every draft made upon them.

This is the attractive offering for the rehearsal and concert the present week: Beethoven, three movements of the ninth symphony; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Saint-Saens, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, Mme Bloomfield-Zeisler; Berlioz, overture, "A Carnival in Rome."

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1898.

The program of the 16th Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture, "For the Consecration of the House"...................................Beethoven
Recitative and aria, "Lusinghe piu care," from "Alessandro"............Handel
Cantilena for 'cello..................Goltermann
"Dance of Sylphs," for 'cello............Popper
Symphony No 4, in D minor.........Schumann
Songs with piano, "Sweet Is True Love," Irish Folk-song..................Foote
Ballet music from "The Demon..Rubinstein

Mr. Apthrop says in the program book of last night, "Coussemaker came out a year or two ago with a bulky volume, proving by carefully collected documents that Gregory the Great had next to nothing, if anything at all, to do with the establishment of the 'Gregorian' Chaunt."

Charles Edmond Henri de Coussemaker was in some respects a remarkable man, but he was not as remarkable as Mr. Apthorp would have us believe.

For Coussemaker died in 1876.

***

The dry and formal overture was anatomically well played. Not even this praise can be awarded to the performance of the symphony. The first movement was rough and confused; the romanze was for once without poetry; the scherzo with its marvelously beautiful trio was beat out in perfunctory cut-and-dried fashion; and the finale was without elasticity or swing. There has not been such a prosaic performance of this nobly melancholy and haunting work in Music Hall for nine years.

There are some that object to the ballet music from "The Demon" in a Symphony concert. I cannot sympathize with this objection, but I well understand how any one may reasonably protest against 'cello pieces by Goltermann and Popper, and songs with piano accompaniment in a concert of this nature. The Cantilena is, in its place, a pretty piece, and in German beer gardens conversation is hushed while it is performed. The "Dance of Sylphs" may well arouse applause at a concert, where the names of "eminent artists" are printed in exceedingly large type on the program. These pieces, however, are beneath the dignity of a Symphony concert. Mr. Schulz played them well enough, but I am surprised that he chose them, and I am still more surprised that Mr. Paur allowed them to be played.

Mrs. Henschel, a skillful cutter of vocal cameos in a small hall, does not give the same pleasure in a large one. She might have spared us the aria from "Alessandro," for she has sung it here before, and there are tunes with orchestra that we have not heard and are worth singing. And if she insisted on singing songs with piano accompaniment was it necessary for her to pay tribute to parochialism? The genteel parlor folk song of Mr. Foote is no novelty, and Mrs. Henschel found in it nothing new.

Philip Hale.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, FEB. 27.

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the Symphony Orchestra gave its sixteenth concert in Music Hall. The programme was:

Overture, "The Consecration of the House".. Beethoven
Recitative and Aria from "Alessandro".Handel
Cantilena for Violoncello...........Goltermann
"Dance of Sylphs," for Violincello......Popper
Symphony No. 4, D minor, Op. 120..Schumann
Elaine's Song..................................
Irish Folk Song..................Arthur Foote
Ballet music from "The Demon"..Rubinstein
Soloists, Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Leo Schulz.

This programme, like the appearance of the swallow and robin, indicates that the severities of winter have become things of the past, and that spring, with its etherial mildness is already upon us, at least in theory. In the midst of the old favorites one regrets to note the absence of the Carlo Broschi overture, Handel's "Sweet Bird" the waltz song from "Romeo and Juliet" and one or two of Mr. Henschel's songs. The novelties introduced, however, demonstrate that Mr. Paur is still on the look out for evidences of local genius, and he cannot be too highly praised for the catholicity of his taste. This musical bouquet of fresh and early spring flowers is particularly welcome at the present time, both for its sweetness and as an example of dainty and cunning programme making. It was a great delight to again hear Mrs. Henschel, after her long absence from the Boston concert stage, and it demonstrates that Mr. Paur is as anxious for novelty as well as for rare artists.

Mr. Foote's songs are romantic rather than classic, but it is impossible on one brief hearing to discover the many beauties that justified their being sung at a symphony concert. The Goltermann Cantilena is a very sweet work, and it was very sweetly played by Mr. Schulz, who, in addition to his technical skill, put a very large amount of dainty delicacy in his work. Mr. Paur conducted the Rubinstein selection as if he had thoroughly mastered the beauties and esoteric mysteries of the work, and it is to be hoped that he will place this too little known work on his next miscellaneous programme. A musical hash is always appetizing if the materials are conscientiously and skilfully selected, and when the Symphony Orchestra deals out the toothsome fare the most exacting and pampered art appetite is satisfied.

At the next concert there will be given three movements from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, his overture No. 3 to Lenore, Saint-Saens' concerto for pianoforte No. 4, and Berlioz's "Carneval Romain." The soloists will be Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2, 1898.

The program of the sixteenthSymphony concert (February 26) was as follows:

Overture, Zur Weihe des Hauses.............Beethoven
Recitative and Aria, Lusinghe piu care, from Alessandro ....Händel
Cantilena, for 'cello......................Goltermann
Danse des Sylphes, for 'cello...................Popper
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.................Schumann
Songs with Piano..................................Foote
Elaine's Song, Sweet is True Love.
Irish Folk-Song.
Ballet Music from Der Dämon...............Rubinstein

The overture, a dry and formal thing, was carefully dissected by Mr. Paur, with the aid of his merry men, but the wondrously beautiful symphony was played either clumsily or drily and without poetic feeling. Why did Mr. Schulz choose such 'cello pieces for his appearance at a symphony concert, and why Mr. Paur allow him to play them? Mrs. Henschel sang her accustomed Händelian aria in her accustomed fashion, and then paid tribute to parochialism by singing two affectedly naive songs of Mr. Foote, which were out of place in a concert of this character.

* * *

I was very sorry not to hear Mrs. Jacoby at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders' Theatre, Cambridge, the 24th. I was told by persons of authority that she charmed orchestra and audience by the sumptuousness of her voice and by her rare personal charms.

JACOBY
AND THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., February 26, 1898.

THE event in music of recent weeks was the appearance here on Thursday evening, the 24th, of Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, the celebrated contralto, who sang here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Emil Paur, conductor.

Her songs were an aria from "Samson and Delilah" by Saint-Saëns, with orchestral accompaniment, and "Im Herbst," by Robert Franz, and "Frühlingsnacht," by Schumann, the latter songs being accompanied by Mr. Paur himself, something he rarely does at any of his concerts in Boston or anywhere.

No encores are permitted at our concerts here, but Mrs. Jacoby was recalled three times, and the members of the orchestra were among the most enthusiastic of all those who insisted upon recalls. She sang the Saint-Saëns aria with great volume of tone and poetic expression, and the two German songs were delivered with true inspiration. Mrs. Jacoby's voice is certainly a most remarkable musical organ, and she is sure to sing here again, judging from the effect she produced upon the audience. VINDEX.

CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE, JANUARY 26.

Mrs. Jacoby gave great pleasure by her artistic singing, especially of the two songs. She received several recalls.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Beethoven: Overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses," opus 124.
Handel: Recitative, "Ne' trofei d'Alessandro," and Aria, "Lusinghe piu care," from "Alessandro."
a. Goltermann: Cantilena, } for violoncello.
b. Popper: "Danse des Sylphes," }
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.
Foote: Songs with Pianoforte—
a. Elaine's Song, "Sweet is true love."
b. Irish Folk-Song.
(Accompanied by the composer.)
Rubinstein: Ballet-Music from "Der Dämon."

Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer, and Mr. Leo Schulz the 'cellist.

This programme calls for especial comment. We have nothing against Mr. Schulz, but the 'cello pieces selected by him were such as ought to have been refused by the conductor; there is no possible excuse for allowing such pieces to be played at a Symphony concert. We shall say no more about them.

Beethoven's overture was grandly played; the work itself is always inspiring and delightful to us. The majestic introduction is so full of beauty, so rich in color; then that bright military transition to the contrapuntal allegro has so much festal briskness and holiday bustle; and the allegro itself, "on an Handelian theme," is a masterpiece. How Beethoven hammers and hammers away at that theme, as if he never could have enough of it! And what vistas of beauty he throws open before you at moments! We know few things more exciting.

We shall never know which one of the four Schumann symphonies we think the greatest; the one heard last always seems so for the time being. We have changed opinion on various subjects several times in our life; but on the head of Schumann we are as yet immovable—and impenitent. People, with Felix Weingartner at the head of them, may talk as they please about his "bad instrumentation"; we cannot, for the life of us, see that it is bad. It may not be supremely skilful, and it may take a good deal of careful rehearsal to establish the proper dynamic balance between all the parts of his orchestra—just as it does in parts of Beethoven's ninth symphony, by the way—but when played with due intelligence, Schumann's instrumentation seems to us about perfect. We can imagine no other way in which what he has to say can be said so well as in his; his instrumentation seems to us to fit his musical thought to a T. The D minor symphony was most admirably played at this concert; Mr. Paur no longer holds back that enchanting conclusion-theme in the finale, as he used to, and now it produces its full effect. And, speaking of Mr. Paur, we find that our ingenious friend, the editor of the programme books, has made one or two sad omissions of late. (When will that unhappy man show more energy in getting up facts?) It was Mr. Paur who brought out Chabrier's "Gwendoline" in Leipzig, almost immediately after Mottl had given it in Carlsruhe, and before it was given in Munich; moreover, the published score of Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony is dedicated to him.

The ballet movements from "Der Dämon" were selected for concert performance by the composer; they come from a full-fledged opera, and are signed by Rubinstein. These facts may be taken as some excuse for playing them. But to us they are sorry stuff indeed; we would give them both, and a pourboire into the bargain, for a single movement from the ballet in the fourth act of Meyerbeer's "Robert." We wonder that Rubinstein was never made a landgraf by some imperial potentate.

Mrs. Henschel sang Handel's air very charmingly indeed. She has not quite the temperament, perhaps, to impersonate the jealous Rossane of the opera—whom we imagine to have been a rather incandescent young person, of generous physique and exacting disposition—but Handel's music in this air is very "absolute" indeed, and fits many different emotional moods equally well. On the somewhat childlike plane of feeling upon which Mrs. Henschel puts it, her light, clean-cut coloratura, halfway between staccato and legato, is very effective and delightful. But when an artist like Mrs. Henschel is engaged to sing at a Symphony concert, could she not meet the honor (for it is one) more graciously by getting up something new for the occasion, instead of singing a song which she has sung, off and on, for more years than our gallantry will permit us to count? Why will she so pertinaciously remind us of Salieri's "La stessa, la stessissima"—without Beethoven's ten variations on the same? Her singing of Mr. Foote's two songs, exquisitely accompanied by the composer, was charm and fascination itself.

The next programme is: Beethoven, three movements from symphony No. 9, in D minor, opus 125; Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72; Saint-Saëns, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, opus 44; Berlioz, overture, "Le Carnival Romain," opus 9. Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 65.

SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven's Work Given with Exquisite Finish.

A 75-Year-Old Symphony That Leaves Virtually Nothing to Be Desired—The Orchestra Never Acquitted Itself Better—Mme. Zeisler the Soloist of the Night.

The programme for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was:

Three movements from symphony No. 9, in D minor........................Beethoven
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.......Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor ....Saint-Saens
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain".......Berlioz

The soloist was Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler.

It was a great night for the orchestra, which never played with greater beauty of style, and never exemplified the splendor of its virtuosity more perfectly. The symphony was magnificently performed. Of the advisability of giving it without the finale, something may be said pro and con; but if the difficulty, under prevailing conditions, of securing a chorus is really potent, it is better to hear three movements than not to hear the work in any form.

Here is a work written 75 years ago that still remains at the head of all masterpieces in its kind that ever composer achieved. Now and then is heard something about a work by this or that master that deserves to be proclaimed the 10th symphony, but the 10th symphony is yet to be written. The only thing that proclaims the age of the work is an occasional cadence that has gone out of fashion, otherwise the symphony is as modern as anything that the most modern of the moderns has produced, plus a lucidity, a prolificness in invention, a perfection in form, an original and powerful individuality that expresses itself with noble dignity and inexhaustible resources that have not been found in such combination since Beethoven's day.

Many fine symphonies have been composed within the three-quarters of a century that have passed since this work first saw the light, but it would seem that here the master said the last immortal word that symphony had to say.

Mr. Paur's reading of the work was full of dignity. He took the opening movement with something more of deliberation in regard to the tempo of the first movement than is traditional, but the results justified the innovation, for everything came out with utter clearness. The composer's indication of the pace is Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso, and it was the emphasis of this maestoso, not as carefully observed as it was by Mr. Paur, that was particularly felicitous and impressive, and that appeared to vindicate the thoughtful conductor's interpretation.

The scherzo was given with immense vigor and splendid effect. It often creates the impression that it is too long and is overburdened with repetitions, but as given last night there was not a note too many. The only fault was the license accorded the drummer to bang his instrument unmercifully. It was well enough at the close of the opening phrase that announces the theme, the effect being decidedly striking in more senses than one; but elsewhere the drums were frequently obtrusive, and were unmusical in the tone they gave.

It is indisputable that this noisiness could not have been intended by Beethoven, for the drums of his day were larger than those of the present, and the drumsticks were more bulky in their heads and produced a softer and really musical sound. The lovely adagio was read and played exquisitely.

The "Leonore" overture was performed with great brilliancy and with a well-balanced beauty of color that is in the power of no other orchestra known to us.

Mme. Zeisler, who was received very cordially, is an artist with an excellent technique. The concerto performed by her is not as interesting as the better known one in G by the same composer, and the artist's presentation of it was not calculated to diminish this impression. The finger work was fluent, smooth and flexible, but the rendering, on the whole, was dry.

The effort was admirable as far as the note playing was concerned, but it was all nothing else than note playing. In addition there was too much of obtrusive affectation in hand and arm flourishing, and of seeming violent effort.

Then, too, of late we have had so many fine pianists who have played much more difficult things with an ease and an absence of this kind of display so surprising and so undisturbing that Mme. Zeisler's contrary method seemed to belong to that far-away period when it was deemed necessary to appeal to the eye as well as the ear of an audience to lure it into indiscriminating applause.

There were some charmingly graceful moments in the playing of the slow movement, but though her finger work is clear and able, and her style intelligent, her performance was neither inspiring nor inspired. The applause that rewarded her efforts was vigorous and prolonged, and she was twice recalled.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn; symphony, "Anthar," Korsakoff, first time; symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," Tschaikowsky; and prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. There will be no soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 7, 1898.

Beethoven and St. Saens by the Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of Saturday began with three movements of Beethoven's ninth symphony. In giving this work one is obliged to steer between Scylla and Charybdis, for if one produces the great choral movement a degree of screaming and yelling is almost sure to result, while if it is omitted there is an inconsequential ending with the variations of the slow movement. On this occasion Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3, immediately followed the third movement of the symphony, coming in lieu of its choral finale.

That the finale can be given with effect Mr. Gericke proved some years ago, but usually the chief enjoyment of this movement comes to the musician who reads it from the score and imagines what its glories might be if it were possible to manufacture throats of steel. Mr. Chadwick, who is rehearsing this finale in Springfield, has introduced some very wise reforms in the manner of studying it. Bearing in mind that the parts are written mercilessly, he conserves the voices of his choristers by practising the movement in C instead of D, thus thoroughly familiarizing the singers with their music (before its performance in the key of D) without wearing out their voices. He has also transferred some of the impossible passages of the bass part to the altos and tenors.

It was, however, a great pleasure to listen to the three movements as given at this concert; never have we heard them performed with more of dignity and power; the tempo of the first movement, taken a trifle slower than usual, only gained in clearness by the innovation, and the tremendous chromatics in the bass part of the coda were like ocean surges. The ingenious development of the simple figure of two notes (a thirty-second and a quarter note) was as clear as crystal, and the dalliance with different keys, in the beginning, was as effective as heart could wish; Beethoven here suggests the key of A, keeps the auditor in suspense for 16 measures, and then allows his subject to come thundering in with the unexpected key of D minor; with Beethoven it is generally the unexpected that happens, but this is one of his master-strokes.

Speaking of master-strokes reminds us that the kettle-drummer played rather injudicious solo during the first movement of this symphony; the loud strokes in the Scherzo, where the kettle-drums have a definite figure (the chief figure of the movement) all to themselves, were permissible, but in the first movement the extreme accentuation of the part was not necessary. The horn-player deserves honorable mention for his excellent work in the Scherzo.

The hypercritical might have found the second theme of the slow movement taken at too slow a pace, but there was a sufficiency of contrast, nevertheless, and the charm of this most expressive movement of the symphony was well conserved. When one bears in mind the fact that Beethoven was so deaf when he wrote the ninth symphony that he could not hear the thunders of applause of a large audience, one is all the more surprised at the delicate construction of this movement.

The "Leonora, No 3" overture was as brilliant as ever. All our readers who attend these concerts are familiar with Mr. Paur's masterly reading of this work, and with the wonderful technique which our orchestra displays in it; suffice it to say, then, that the violins rode in the whirlwind, in the coda of the overture, that Mr. Mueller played the trumpet call without break, that every nuance and shading was given in a manner that would have been deemed impossible in Beethoven's day; we may not possess the golden epoch of musical creation at this end of the century, but we certainly are living in an era of musical interpretation that is unrivalled by anything in the past.

The trumpet passage above alluded to is rather a rare thing to find in a Beethoven score; in not one of the master's works is there a trumpet passage of any great difficulty, and the same may be said of the works of Haydn, Mozart and Weber; the classical epoch was the period of decadence for the trumpet.

Now followed St. Saens' piano concerto in C minor, not a very great work when compared with some that he himself has achieved, yet ingenious in construction and original in form. The work has plenty of the modern bravura and demands a technical ability of high rank for its performance. It had a brilliant artist to carry it to success on this occasion, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler being the soloist.

This lady proved herself possessed of masculine vigor and none of the difficulties of the concerto seemed to overweight her, although she displayed more of what Liszt used to call "Schulter-gefuehl" ("emotion of the shoulders") than we are accustomed to see on the concert-platform, by swaying about, by waving of arm, and by palpable bracing for heavy passages. There was even an excess of power in some of her chord and octave work, a fault which leans so much to virtue's side in a female pianist that one might almost chronicle it as merit.

The concerto is not the most grateful work to perform for St. Saens often favors the orchestra at the expense of the solo instrument, and at times gives a Herculean burden to the pianist to carry without a fitting recompense in artistic beauty. The pianist was recalled with much applause which she undoubtedly had earned.

Berlioz's "Carnival Romaine" overture came as end and culmination to a programme which had dealt largely in technical difficulties both orchestral and solo; it received a superb performance. The beautiful dialogue between English horn and viola was perfectly performed. The combination of these two tone-colors is a very fitting one, for as the English horn is the voice of melancholy and brooding among the wood-wind instruments, so the viola reproduces these emotions in string tones.

The sudden contrast to the quiet nature of this serenade, the wild irruption of the merry-makers, the swift rush of chromatic passages, the bright clangor of festivity introducing almost every percussive effect even to tambourines and triangle, the wild hilarity of the Saltarello, all these make up a picture that is one of the best instances of programme-music, and these lost nothing in the performance, for it seemed as if the excellent work begun in the ninth symphony had inspired the men and orchestra and conductor marched on from one point of virtuosity to another.

Virtue is its own reward, and so is virtuosity, the reward in this latter case being that there are no difficulties in any scores for our excellent orchestra.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1898.

NINTH SYMPHONY

Of Beethoven Given Without the Last Movement at the 17th Concert of the Orchestra Last Night in Music Hall.

The program of the 17th Symphony concert was as follows:

Three Movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor........................Beethoven
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3.......Beethoven
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, Op. 44....................Saint-Saëns
Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Berlioz

Beethoven's 9th symphony was first performed in Boston, Feb. 5, 1853, when the solo singers were Miss Stone, Miss Humphrey, Mr. Low and Mr. Thomas Ball. The orchestra was the Germania, under Mr. Bergmann; the chorus was the Handel and Haydn. The success was so great that the performance was repeated April 2 of that year.

The last performance of it in complete form was under Mr. Nikisch, Dec. 17, 1892, when the solo singers were Miss Priscilla White, Miss Leimer, Mr. W. J. Winch and Mr. Meyn.

Mr. Paur led three orchestral movements, as he did last night, April 24, 1897.

The work as a whole has not been performed in this city of arrogant musical pretension since 1892.

⁂

It may be said that the finale is written so outrageously for the voices that a perfect performance is impossible, and that the result of the attempt under Mr. Nikisch was not of a nature to warrant a repetition with such a chorus. It is true that the vocal parts are often of extreme difficulty, well nigh impossible; but I believe that the Cecilia, if thoroughly trained, could sing the greater part of the finals effectively. And it does seem to me a matter of regret that this symphony is not at least attempted in its complete form. For what in the world has the Leonore overture No. 3 to do with the orchestral movements of the symphony. In 1897 the three movements and the Leonore No. 3 closed the concert. I then said in substance that if any music is to be substituted for a finale of the symphony and serve as the last number of the program, Beethoven must follow Beethoven, and the Leonore No. 3 is perhaps the best suited to the occasion. But last night there was no need of the overture. It seemed out of place, and it lengthened unduly the program.

⁂

The fragments, however, outside of their marvelous beauty and grandeur, served this purpose: they showed how much more dramatic absolute music may be than music that is written expressly for the opera house. What operatic scene is as full of heartrending, unendurable pathos as is the adagio that follows the scherzo which is so full of earthly gayety? And here comes again the need of the finale to answer doubt and comfort grief. The finale is almost impossible; but such an adagio demands the impossible.

I do not believe that we yet realize fully the stupendous proportions of this symphony. Even with the best leaders, each reading is more or less of an experiment. It seemed last night at first that Mr. Paur took the opening movement at too slow a pace; and yet there are pages where a quicker pace would have destroyed the sombre majesty. The first movement is still a riddle. Let each solve it in his own way. For if the reading is only thoughtful and sincere, the music is full of mighty suggestion, according to the mood of the conductor and yourself.

⁂

The beater of kettledrums who displays military precision must have a dull ear. He forgets that the drum may, after all, be a musical instrument. He at times also forgets that drums should be tuned precisely.

⁂

Mrs. Zeisler is no stranger to a symphony audience. Last night was, I believe, her fifth appearance at these concerts. She chose the C minor concerto of Saint-Saëns, which is a fine example of the technical skill and glittering insincerity of the composer. She played it at Cambridge in 1891. The years have not robbed her of disagreeable exuberance in gesture. She plays to the eye as well as the ear. Such pianists as Siloti, Paderewski and others, male and female, have shown conclusively that repose is possible in passages of the utmost difficulty. Tossing arms wildly in the air, bracing onesself visibly in the sight of the public—all this is old-fashioned ostentation. It detracts from a performance. She is a woman of nimble fingers; her bravura is often truly brilliant; her gradations of tone are often effective; she plays with fire and her temperament is plausible if not deep. She does not need to indulge in such extravagance. She could win easily applause and praise without extraneous appeal.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1898.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

Mrs Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist at the 17th symphony concert. The program comprised three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony, the Beethoven third "Leonore" overture, Saint-Saens' pianoforte concerto, No. 4 and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. Mrs Zeisler's performance of the Saint-Saens' work was an interpretation that should rank with the foremost contributions of piano music heard in this city in the course of the current season. The style of the composition gives but little opportunity for the expression of the romantic and tenderer emotions, but the ornamental work and figural extensions in the score are of the most difficult and elaborate nature, and to Mrs Zeisler is due the highest praise for a dazzling display of impetuosity, power and verve. The technical difficulties afforded no stumbling block to her nimble fingers and strong wrist, and she imparted to the composition a delightful warmth and color, displaying a depth of feeling as well as a physical endurance to be found only in artists of the highest ability.

There is so much of a showy character in the piece that the more delicate arpeggi of the first movement is almost forgotten in the general effect of the work. The fairylike delicacy of the theme leading up to the cantabile phrases was exquisitely executed, and the lively scherzando was also played with a delicacy of touch that showed the artist at her best. The staccato themes were very clear and virile, and the rushing finale in double octaves was given with wonderful vigor and rapidity. She was greeted with overwhelming applause at the close of her performance, being summoned to the platform many times by the applauding auditors.

The orchestra played the accompaniment in an admirable manner, especially the beautiful melodies of the first movement. The three parts of the Beethoven symphony were given with great efficiency. The second violins were notably good in the adagio and the fantastic rhythms of the scherzo, with its constantly changing accent and phrasing, showed the ensemble playing of the band in the most favorable light. The Berlioz carnival overture received sympathetic treatment, which was evidently an easy task to the men, after the immensely difficult accompaniment to the preceding conterto.

The program this week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphony, "Anthar," first time; Tschaikovsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini,;" Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The seventeenth concert was given in Music Hall last evening. Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler was the soloist. The programme included three movements of the ninth Symphony and the "Leonore" overture No. 3 of Beethoven's Saint-Saens's pianoforte concerto No. 4 and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." Mme. Zeisler does not often appear in this city, and when she does play here there is always much interest in her performance, as she is a pianist of the highest rank. The work has some movements of beauty. The scherzo movement is in Saint-Saens's usual tricky vein and technical difficulties are plenty, but it is certainly not an effective work of its class. Mme. Zeisler played with great brilliancy and at times with feeling, and probably gave as satisfactory performance of the concerto as could anyone. She was well received at the close of her performance. The orchestral selections were given admirably in every way, and the whole concert was an enjoyable one. The programme for the next concert will include a new symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff; Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger."

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1898.

Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight at Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the sixth in its series of concerts and from the program announced it should prove as enjoyable as any that have preceded it. The program is as follows: Beethoven, Three Movements from the ninth Symphony; Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Chopin, Concerto for Pianoforte, in E minor, Auber, Overture, "Le Domino Noir."

The eminent pianist Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1898.

Mr. Paur presented as the soloist for his seventeenth concert Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not been heard at a Symphony during his incumbency, and who played Saint-Saens's fourth pianoforte concerto, her rendering of which has had elsewhere the warm, just praise which was bestowed upon it here. She came remembered as a player in whom ardor of temperament, imagination, enthusiasm and delight in the thrill of her own powers had been wont to prevail over judgment, self-command and equability. She showed that study, experience and well-directed reflection had governed and chastened her exuberance without robbing her of earnestness, dash, fervor and exultant strength. She has now a right to the eminent place she holds among pianists, and the listener has often to be grateful for the rich color and full feeling which she adds to her resplendent technique. Her rendering was thoroughly fine—satisfying in its intellectuality, and stirring by impassioned sweep. Very interesting was the sense of gradation evidenced in the long crescendos and diminuendos; there were light and flash for the ornamentation, and solid, well-applied strength for the more emphatic and massive portions. Once more, it was fine work.

The concerto was preceded—and it was a severe and not altogether fair and kindly contrast—by Beethoven's ninth symphony, without the choral finale, and his "Leonore No. 3" overture. The stern stickler for absolute integrity in the treatment of Beethoven may have regretted the absence of that final movement; but after reflection he could but modify his feeling; for it is but rare indeed when soloists and choir can be found capable of delivering that exhausting vocal score at once with textual accuracy and with the ease and freedom which alone can convey that sense of triumphant independent, soaring joy which Beethoven desired to give. Theoretically, the symphony suffered; but an abbreviation is preferable to an anticlimax. The three movements, the overture and also the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berliz, which ended the concert, were well up to the orchestra's best standard, and it was good to hear the wonderful wealth of the symphony once more.

The next programme is appointed thus: Mendelssohn, Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphony, "Anthar," (first time); Tschaikowsky, Symphonic Poem, "Francesca da Rimini;" Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. There was a large audience, somewhat larger, perhaps, than usual, the increased attendance being undoubtedly due to the fact that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, one of the world's few really great pianists, was announced as the soloist for the evening. They were rewarded by hearing a most excellent performance, not only by the soloists, but by the orchestra as well. The evening's programme was as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven....................
Three Movements from the Ninth Symphony
I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso (D minor)
II. Molto vivace (D minor)
Presto (D major)
III. Adagio molto e cantabile (B-flat major)
Ludwig van Beethoven....................
..............Overture to "Lenore," No. 3
Frederic Chopin..............................
Concerto for Pianoforte, in E minor, Op. 11
Allegro maestoso.
Romance, Larghetto.
Rondo, Vivace.
Daniel-Francois-Esprit Auber................
...............Overture, "Le Domino Noir"

If there was a fault anywhere about this programme, it was that the element of contrast was neglected in its make-up The "Lenore" overture of Beethoven, fine as it is, might well have been supplanted by something of a different genre, coming as it did after the weighty movements of the ninth symphony. It seemed a pity, too, that the symphony itself could not have been given as a whole. The fourth movement, omitted last night, calls for quartet and chorus, in addition to the orchestra. The management of the Arion Club would doubtless have been glad to cooperate with Mr. Paur in giving this, and so, with comparatively little trouble, a complete hearing of Beethoven's master work might have been afforded. It is to be hoped that this may be done at some future time, for the final movement of the ninth symphony is the crown of the work. Of course, it was a pleasure to hear the other numbers, magnificently played as they were last night, but the complete work would have been still more satisfying, and would have marked the apex of the season's work in a memorable way.

Mr. Joseffy is always sure of a warm welcome here, but it is to be doubted if he has ever appeared to greater advantage than he did last evening in his masterly performance of Chopin's E minor concerto. The work is peculiarly suited to Mr. Joseffy's abilities, calling as it does for the finest and most delicate treatment. It may well be doubted if any living player could have improved upon the performance vouchsafed last night by this superb artist. A word of praise is also due to the orchestra for its brilliant and sympathetic accompaniment, and to Mr. Paur for the taste and skill with which he followed and supported the soloist. The applause at the conclusion of the number was overwhelming.

Auber's brilliant overture to "Le Domino Noir" brought the concert to a successful close. The overture is theatric in character but full of "catchy" melody and scored with the skill and large sense of orchestral color for which the greatest of French composers was justly celebrated. It was played with immense precision and fire. The seventh Symphony concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 30.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sixth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry hall is announced for next Wednesday evening, March 9. The program opens with three movements from the famous Ninth or Choral Symphony of Beethoven, which was composed in 1823, and the score dedicated to Freidrich Wilhelm III, King of Prussia. The work was first performed in Vienna on May 27, 1824. The fourth and final movement of this Symphony, which is omitted at this concert, is in the form of a choral, sung with a quartet and mixed chorus, accompaniments which make this movement of rare occurrence in purely orchestral concerts.

The second selection will be the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, also by Beethoven. There are three of these overtures to "Leonore" and again a fourth one, better known as the overture to the opera "Fidelio." Each of these overtures ranks as among the very first of their kind, the latter ones illustrating Beethoven's frequent inclination to improve upon his original composition.

The closing orchestral number is Auber's overture to "The Black Domino." "Le Domino Noir," a comic opera in three acts, the text by Eugene Scribe and the music by Auber, was first presented in Paris, on Dec. 2, 1837, and was for many years one of the most popular comic operas, both in France and Germany.

It will be a source of unbounded satisfaction to the musical public of Providence to know that the soloist for this concert will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, for many years accepted as one of the most brilliant finished and eminently popular pianists of the present age. The peculiar fascination and charm of his playing needs no exploiting here, for in nearly every city in this country of any musical importance the name of Joseffy can honestly be called a household word. Mr. Joseffy will play the Concerto for pianoforte in E minor by Chopin.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Three Movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor, opus 125.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, opus 44.
Berlioz: Overture, "Le Carnival Romain," opus 9.
Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

Much has been said, both pro and con, concerning the propriety of giving the three orchestral movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony without the choral finale. To our thinking the question is one of those in the solving of which merely practical considerations may well have some weight. From a purely artistic point of view it is certainly a pity to give a great work like the ninth symphony in a truncated shape; but conditions may arise, or may even have existed for some time, which put serious practical obstacles in the way of obtaining a worthy performance of the entire work, and it often seems like pushing an artistic point too far to shelve the orchestral movements indefinitely simply because there is trouble about the finale. It seems to us that the æsthetic sin of giving the orchestral movements separately may at times safely be winked at, and three-quarters of a loaf be better than no bread. Still it is not to be denied that waiving one artistic point only brings up another. Admitting that the omission of the choral finale may at times be condoned, the new question arises: what is to come next? There are probably few movements in all music more difficult to follow well with something else than the Adagio of the ninth symphony. Nothing that we now think of can approach the appositeness of that anarchic shriek of the wind instruments with which the finale begins. Surely few things could be less apposite than the "Leonore" No. 3. The downrightness of the dramatic tragedy of the introduction to the overture seems cheap and impertinent, after the more ideal tragedy of the Adagio; never has the key of C major been less welcome than it was just at this point last Saturday evening. And yet one may say, if not the "Leonore," what else? Ah! there is a question we cannot answer; we can think of nothing else. Here is, after all, the most serious difficulty; if the choral finale of the ninth is omitted, what is to be played next? Echo answers.

The three movements were, for the most part, admirably given. Mr. Paur's reading of the first movement has much that is fine in it; he well understands the temptation offered by Beethoven's cautionary tempo-mark: Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso—two temptations to the modern lover of the slow allegro! He takes the "ma non troppo" at its true value, as modifying, but not cancelling, the "allegro;" in the same way, he does not forget the "un poco" in paying attention to the "maestoso." He takes the tempo just slow enough for dignity and impressiveness, without broadening it out to that ne plus ultra of "maestoso," the living incarnation of which is best to be recognized in the puffing majesty of a head butler. His marked holding back the tempo just after the double bar and the change of signature to B-flat major we do not like; it strikes us as too melodramatic. But, for the rest, his reading of the movement is admirable, up to the level of the situation. The scherzo went superbly from beginning to end. In the earlier parts of the Adagio we should have preferred a more delicate mezza voce both in the strings and wind, especially in the latter; the swelling and diminishing of the tone in the little clarinet, bassoon and horn responses seemed to us rather overdone. The second theme in three-quarter time, too, seemed played somewhat too grandiosely, with too much tone. But these are slight defects, after all, mere matters of taste; the great movement was, as a whole, wonderfully read and played.

The third "Leonore" was played as Mr. Paur generally plays it: with the Allegro beginning too slow, and then growing too fast, with the gradual accelerando. But then, the effect of the overture was far more spoiled by coming immediately after the Adagio of the symphony; it was half through before one could get acclimated to its atmosphere. But it takes more untoward conditions than we can well imagine to prevent that mighty coda from bringing an audience up to boiling-point.

But, if the opening part of the overture seemed like cold water after the symphony, the first measures of Saint-Saëns's concerto were like ice after the overture. We suddenly felt as if we were back at the conservatory again, looking over exercises on the blackboard. In fact, Saint-Saëns is no very inspiring man; his individuality is so like that of a composite photograph. It has been said of late that he has no individuality at all, that, if individuality makes the man, there is no such person as Saint-Saëns in the world. No doubt, he is extremely, excessively composite; but we do not think him more so than Meyerbeer, whose style was made up of all the broken meats of the European musical charity-basket of his day. Look back a little, and you find French critics between 1830 and 1845 speaking of Meyerbeer very much as Mr. J. F. Runciman spoke of Saint-Saëns in the last Musical Record (or was it the Saturday Review?). But who can say now that Meyerbeer had no individuality? He had individuality enough to ear-mark wellnigh everything he ever wrote, so that it can be recognized as distinctly his, and nobody's else. In time Saint-Saëns's individuality may crystallize out, so as to be equally recognizable. True, the present concerto is almost all Meyerbeer—at moments you find yourself suddenly plunged into the midst of "Struensee"—but well done beyond Meyerbeer's wildest dreams. It is enormously clever and brilliant; it even gains a certain semblance of vitality from the prodigious skill with which it is carried through; and where it is best done it is also most vulgar. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler played it simply superbly; not an effect escaped her; there was not a string of diamonds which her touch did not polish to the most dazzling flash. The qualities demanded of a pianist by this concerto are not particularly high nor deep; but, such as the bill was, her playing filled it completely. The audience was enthusiastic as possible.

The concert closed with one of the most exhaustively fine performances of Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" we have ever heard or imagined.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphony, "Antar" (first time in Boston); Tchaikovsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 6, 1898.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

Mrs Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist at the 17th symphony concert. The program comprised three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony, the Beethoven third "Leonore" overture, Saint-Saens' pianoforte concerto, No. 4 and Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture. Mrs Zeisler's performance of the Saint-Saens' work was an interpretation that should rank with the foremost contributions of piano music heard in this city in the course of the current season. The style of the composition gives but little opportunity for the expression of the romantic and tenderer emotions, but the ornamental work and figural extensions in the score are of the most difficult and elaborate nature, and to Mrs Zeisler is due the highest praise for a dazzling display of impetuosity, power and verve. The technical difficulties afforded no stumbling block to her nimble fingers and strong wrist, and she imparted to the composition a delightful warmth and color, displaying a depth of feeling as well as a physical endurance to be found only in artists of the highest ability.

There is so much of a showy character in the piece that the more delicate arpeggi of the first movement is almost forgotten in the general effect of the work. The fairylike delicacy of the theme leading up to the cantabile phrases was exquisitely executed, and the lively scherzando was also played with a delicacy of touch that showed the artist at her best. The staccato themes were very clear and virile, and the rushing finale in double octaves was given with wonderful vigor and rapidity. She was greeted with overwhelming applause at the close of her performance, being summoned to the platform many times by the applauding auditors.

The orchestra played the accompaniment in an admirable manner, especially the beautiful melodies of the first movement. The three parts of the Beethoven symphony were given with great efficiency. The second violins were notably good in the adagio and the fantastic rhythms of the scherzo, with its constantly changing accent and phrasing, showed the ensemble playing of the band in the most favorable light. The Berlioz carnival overture received sympathetic treatment, which was evidently an easy task to the men, after the immensely dificult accompaniment to the preceding conterto.

The program this week will be as follows: Mendelssohn, overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphony, "Anthar," first time; Tschaikovsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini,;" Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The seventeenth concert was given in Music Hall last evening. Mme. Bloomfield Zeisler was the soloist. The programme included three movements of the ninth Symphony and the "Leonore" overture No. 3 of Beethoven's Saint-Saens's pianoforte concerto No. 4 and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival." Mme. Zeisler does not often appear in this city, and when she does play here there is always much interest in her performance, as she is a pianist of the highest rank. The work has some movements of beauty. The scherzo movement is in Saint-Saens's usual tricky vein and technical difficulties are plenty, but it is certainly not an effective work of its class. Mme. Zeisler played with great brilliancy and at times with feeling, and probably gave as satisfactory performance of the concerto as could anyone. She was well received at the close of her performance. The orchestral selections were given admirably in every way, and the whole concert was an enjoyable one. The programme for the next concert will include a new symphony by Rimsky-Korsakoff; Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage"; Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger."

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1898.

Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight at Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will give the sixth in its series of concerts and from the program announced it should prove as enjoyable as any that have preceded it. The program is as follows: Beethoven, Three Movements from the ninth Symphony; Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Chopin, Concerto for Pianoforte, in E minor., Auber, Overture, "Le Domino Noir."

The eminent pianist Rafael Joseffy will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 6, 1898.

Mr. Paur presented as the soloist for his seventeenth concert Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has not been heard at a Symphony during his incumbency, and who played Saint-Saens's fourth pianoforte concerto, her rendering of which has had elsewhere the warm, just praise which was bestowed upon it here. She came remembered as a player in whom ardor of temperament, imagination, enthusiasm and delight in the thrill of her own powers had been wont to prevail over judgment, self-command and equability. She showed that study, experience and well-directed reflection had governed and chastened her exuberance without robbing her of earnestness, dash, fervor and exultant strength. She has now a right to the eminent place she holds among pianists, and the listener has often to be grateful for the rich color and full feeling which she adds to her resplendent technique. Her rendering was thoroughly fine—satisfying in its intellectuality, and stirring by impassioned sweep. Very interesting was the sense of gradation evidenced in the long crescendos and diminuendos; there were light and flash for the ornamentation, and solid, well-applied strength for the more emphatic and massive portions. Once more, it was fine work.

The concerto was preceded—and it was a severe and not altogether fair and kindly contrast—by Beethoven's ninth symphony, without the choral finale, and his "Leonore No. 3" overture. The stern stickler for absolute integrity in the treatment of Beethoven may have regretted the absence of that final movement; but after reflection he could but modify his feeling; for it is but rare indeed when soloists and choir can be found capable of delivering that exhausting vocal score at once with textual accuracy and with the ease and freedom which alone can convey that sense of triumphant independent, soaring joy which Beethoven desired to give. Theoretically, the symphony suffered; but an abbreviation is preferable to an anticlimax. The three movements, the overture and also the "Roman Carnival" overture of Berliz, which ended the concert, were well up to the orchestra's best standard, and it was good to hear the wonderful wealth of the symphony once more.

The next programme is appointed thus: Mendelssohn, Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage;" Rimsky-Korsakoff, Symphony, "Anthar," (first time); Tschaikowsky, Symphonic Poem, "Francesca da Rimini;" Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening at Infantry Hall. There was a large audience, somewhat larger, perhaps, than usual, the increased attendance being undoubtedly due to the fact that Mr. Rafael Joseffy, one of the world's few really great pianists, was announced as the soloist for the evening. They were rewarded by hearing a most excellent performance, not only by the soloists, but by the orchestra as well. The evening's programme was as follows:

Ludwig van Beethoven....................
Three Movements from the Ninth Symphony
I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso (D minor)
II. Molto vivace (D minor)
Presto (D major)
III. Adagio molto e cantabile (B-flat major)
Ludwig van Beethoven....................
..............Overture to "Lenore," No. 3
Frederic Chopin..........................
Concerto for Pianoforte, in E minor, Op. 11
Allegro maestoso.
Romance, Larghetto.
Rondo, Vivace.
Daniel-Francois-Esprit Auber...............
...............Overture, "Le Domino Noir"

If there was a fault anywhere about this programme, it was that the element of contrast was neglected in its make-up The "Lenore" overture of Beethoven, fine as it is, might well have been supplanted by something of a different genre, coming as it did after the weighty movements of the ninth symphony. It seemed a pity, too, that the symphony itself could not have been given as a whole. The fourth movement, omitted last night, calls for quartet and chorus, in addition to the orchestra. The management of the Arion Club would doubtless have been glad to cooperate with Mr. Paur in giving this, and so, with comparatively little trouble, a complete hearing of Beethoven's master work might have been afforded. It is to be hoped that this may be done at some future time, for the final movement of the ninth symphony is the crown of the work. Of course, it was a pleasure to hear the other numbers, magnificently played as they were last night, but the complete work would have been still more satisfying, and would have marked the apex of the season's work in a memorable way.

Mr. Joseffy is always sure of a warm welcome here, but it is to be doubted if he has ever appeared to greater advantage than he did last evening in his masterly performance of Chopin's E minor concerto. The work is peculiarly suited to Mr. Joseffy's abilities, calling as it does for the finest and most delicate treatment. It may well be doubted if any living player could have improved upon the performance vouchsafed last night by this superb artist. A word of praise is also due to the orchestra for its brilliant and sympathetic accompaniment, and to Mr. Paur for the taste and skill with which he followed and supported the soloist. The applause at the conclusion of the number was overwhelming.

Auber's brilliant overture to "Le Domino Noir" brought the concert to a successful close. The overture is theatric in character, but full of "catchy" melody and scored with the skill and large sense of orchestral color for which the greatest of French composers was justly celebrated. It was played with immense precision and fire. The seventh Symphony concert will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 30.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sixth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry hall is announced for next Wednesday evening, March 9. The program opens with three movements from the famous Ninth or Choral Symphony of Beethoven, which was composed in 1823, and the score dedicated to Freidrich Wilhelm III, King of Prussia. The work was first performed in Vienna on May 27, 1824. The fourth and final movement of this Symphony, which is omitted at this concert, is in the form of a choral, sung with a quartet and mixed chorus, accompaniments which make this movement of rare occurrence in purely orchestral concerts.

The second selection will be the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, also by Beethoven. There are three of these overtures to "Leonore" and again a fourth one, better known as the overture to the opera "Fidelio." Each of these overtures ranks as among the very first of their kind, the latter ones illustrating Beethoven's frequent inclination to improve upon his original composition.

The closing orchestral number is Auber's overture to "The Black Domino." "Le Domino Noir," a comic opera in three acts, the text by Eugene Scribe and the music by Auber, was first presented in Paris, on Dec. 2, 1837, and was for many years one of the most popular comic operas, both in France and Germany.

It will be a source of unbounded satisfaction to the musical public of Providence to know that the soloist for this concert will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy, for many years accepted as one of the most brilliant finished and eminently popular pianists of the present age. The peculiar fascination and charm of his playing needs no exploiting here, for in nearly every city in this country of any musical importance the name of Joseffy can honestly be called a household word. Mr. Joseffy will play the Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, by Chopin.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Three Movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor, opus 125.
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72.
Saint-Saëns: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in C minor, opus 44.
Berlioz: Overture, "Le Carnival Romain," opus 9.
Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

Much has been said, both pro and con, concerning the propriety of giving the three orchestral movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony without the choral finale. To our thinking the question is one of those in the solving of which merely practical considerations may well have some weight. From a purely artistic point of view it is certainly a pity to give a great work like the ninth symphony in a truncated shape; but conditions may arise, or may even have existed for some time, which put serious practical obstacles in the way of obtaining a worthy performance of the entire work, and it often seems like pushing an artistic point too far to shelve the orchestral movements indefinitely simply because there is trouble about the finale. It seems to us that the æsthetic sin of giving the orchestral movements separately may at times safely be winked at, and three-quarters of a loaf be better than no bread. Still it is not to be denied that waiving one artistic point only brings up another. Admitting that the omission of the choral finale may at times be condoned, the new question arises: what is to come next? There are probably few movements in all music more difficult to follow well with something else than the Adagio of the ninth symphony. Nothing that we now think of can approach the appositeness of that anarchic shriek of the wind instruments with which the finale begins. Surely few things could be less apposite than the "Leonore" No. 3. The downrightness of the dramatic tragedy of the introduction to the overture seems cheap and impertinent, after the more ideal tragedy of the Adagio; never has the key of C major been less welcome than it was just at this point last Saturday evening. And yet one may say, if not the "Leonore," what else? Ah! there is a question we cannot answer; we can think of nothing else. Here is, after all, the most serious difficulty; if the choral finale of the ninth is omitted, what is to be played next? Echo answers.

The three movements were, for the most part, admirably given. Mr. Paur's reading of the first movement has much that is fine in it; he well understands the temptation offered by Beethoven's cautionary tempo-mark: Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso—two temptations to the modern lover of the slow allegro! He takes the "ma non troppo" at its true value, as modifying, but not cancelling, the "allegro;" in the same way, he does not forget the "un poco" in paying attention to the "maestoso." He takes the tempo just slow enough for dignity and impressiveness, without broadening it out to that ne plus ultra of "maestoso," the living incarnation of which is best to be recognized in the puffing majesty of a head butler. His marked holding back the tempo just after the double bar and the change of signature to B-flat major we do not like; it strikes us as too melodramatic. But, for the rest, his reading of the movement is admirable, up to the level of the situation. The scherzo went superbly from beginning to end. In the earlier parts of the Adagio we should have preferred a more delicate mezza voce both in the strings and wind, especially in the latter; the swelling and diminishing of the tone in the little clarinet, bassoon and horn responses seemed to us rather overdone. The second theme in three-quarter time, too, seemed played somewhat too grandiosely, with too much tone. But these are slight defects, after all, mere matters of taste; the great movement was, as a whole, wonderfully read and played.

The third "Leonore" was played as Mr. Paur generally plays it: with the Allegro beginning too slow, and then growing too fast, with the gradual accelerando. But then, the effect of the overture was far more spoiled by coming immediately after the Adagio of the symphony; it was half through before one could get acclimated to its atmosphere. But it takes more untoward conditions than we can well imagine to prevent that mighty coda from bringing an audience up to boiling-point.

But, if the opening part of the overture seemed like cold water after the symphony, the first measures of Saint-Saëns's concerto were like ice after the overture. We suddenly felt as if we were back at the conservatory again, looking over exercises on the blackboard. In fact, Saint-Saëns is no very inspiring man; his individuality is so like that of a composite photograph. It has been said of late that he has no individuality at all, that, if individuality makes the man, there is no such person as Saint-Saëns in the world. No doubt, he is extremely, excessively composite; but we do not think him more so than Meyerbeer, whose style was made up of all the broken meats of the European musical charity-basket of his day. Look back a little, and you find French critics between 1830 and 1845 speaking of Meyerbeer very much as Mr. J. F. Runciman spoke of Saint-Saëns in the last Musical Record (or was it the Saturday Review?). But who can say now that Meyerbeer had no individuality? He had individuality enough to ear-mark wellnigh everything he ever wrote, so that it can be recognized as distinctly his, and nobody's else. In time Saint-Saëns's individuality may crystallize out, so as to be equally recognizable. True, the present concerto is almost all Meyerbeer—at moments you find yourself suddenly plunged into the midst of "Struensee"—but well done beyond Meyerbeer's wildest dreams. It is enormously clever and brilliant; it even gains a certain semblance of vitality from the prodigious skill with which it is carried through; and where it is best done it is also most vulgar. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler played it simply superbly; not an effect escaped her; there was not a string of diamonds which her touch did not polish to the most dazzling flash. The qualities demanded of a pianist by this concerto are not particularly high nor deep; but, such as the bill was, her playing filled it completely. The audience was enthusiastic as possible.

The concert closed with one of the most exhaustively fine performances of Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" we have ever heard or imagined.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphony, "Anthar" (first time in Boston); Tchaikovsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini"; Wagner, prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1898.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Performed by the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Alexandre Siloti Gave His Last Piano Recital.

The program of the 18th Symphony Concert, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage"	Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2, "Antar," op. 15	Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini,"	Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg	Wagner

Mendelssohn's overture "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" bears the same relation to music that "Barriers Burned Away" or "The Opening of a Chestnut Burr" does to literature. Why drag it in its dull length into the concert-room in this, the year of our Lord 1898.

⁂

The program book says that "Antar" was first publicly performed in Magdeburg in 1881. It was performed before that date—in St. Petersburg in 1868. The local critics did not like it; but we find von Bülow praising the work loudly in 1878, speaking of it as a "superb tone painting" and of the composer as "a true tone-poet." When the piece was performed at Magdeburg Mr. Nikisch was the conductor. It was played in New York in the season of '91-92.

In "Antar" the flight of imagination is not as high, the workmanship is not as secure and authoritative as in "Scheherazade." The themes are not sufficiently developed. The constant repetition in different keys, by various instruments, and with varying counterpoint soon becomes monotonous. There is interesting experimenting in tonal color, but there is little true musical thought in this strange symphony—at least so it seems to me after one hearing.

⁂

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," which has been played before this at a Symphony concert, and was produced here for the first time by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann, Dec. 31, 1891, was composed in 1876. It was conceived originally as an opera, but the librettist, Zvantsev, imposed conditions. He insisted that his book should be treated according to Wagnerian theories. Tschaikowsky would not yield to him; the opera was abandoned; he felt obliged to treat Francesca in some musical manner, and this symphonic poem was the result. He once told his friend Kashkin that Doré's illustrations to the Inferno influenced him considerably in his music-picture of Hell's Whirlwind.

And this music-picture of Hell's Whirlwind—"cruellest winds under a dark and gloomy air"—is marvelously successful. It is the strongest feature of the fantasia. The music that is supposed to tell the story of Madonna Francesca's love for Polo—"a handsome man, very pleasant, and of a courteous breeding"—of the kiss upon her mouth, all quivering, this music is not irresistible in its delineation of consuming passion and poignant woe. There is no love theme like the wondrous melody in the "Romeo and Juliet" by the same composer.

As purely pictorial music, if the phrase may be allowed, there is nothing in the literature of the orchestra that compares with this attempt to reproduce the fury of the wind. And, hearing it and remembering the wind-swept flight of the lovers in Doré's drawings, you realize the meaning of Tschaikowsky's remark.

The fantasia was read and played most dramatically, and the technic of the orchestra shone dazzlingly, even although "Hell is murky" might serve as a motto to the composition.

⁂

Mr. Alexandre Siloti gave his third and last piano recital yesterday afternoon in Steinert Hall, which was full to overflowing. He was assisted by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder. The program was as follows:

Trio, D minor, op. 32	Arensky
"Islamey"	Balakireff
Etude, La Nuit	Glazounoff
Prelude, op. 3	Rachmaninoff
Etude, op. 31	Arensky
"Esquisse," No. 1	Arensky
"Complainte," nocturne	Tschaikowsky-Siloti
Paraphrase on themes from "Onegin"	Tschaikowsky-Pabst
Etude, D flat major	Liszt
Consolation, No. 5	Liszt
Fantaise	Chopin
Etude, No. 3, op. 10	Chopin
Ballade, A flat	Chopin
Nocturne, D flat	Chopin
Scherzo, B flat	Chopin

The trio by Arensky was written in memory of Charles Davidoff, the celebrated 'cellist. It is a clearly made and tuneful work, which seldom rises above salon-elegance and salon-emotion. The first two movements are better than the elegy and the finale. The elegy is never a deep, heartfelt wail, and it is not firmly knit together; nor is the conversation between the violin and 'cello without monotony and the suggestion of chattering during the funeral exercises. The scherzo, piquant in rhythm and melody, is delightful. The trio of this scherzo reminds one of the trio of the scherzo in Saint-Saëns's G minor piano concerto, by the rhythm and the introduction of the theme rather than by the theme itself. The work, it is perhaps needless to say, was played in masterly fashion.

⁂

Mr. Siloti gave an astounding performance of Balakireff's "Islamey," playing the polyphonic passages with incredible clearness and brilliancy. His repetition of Glazounoff's "La Nuit" and Rachmaninoff's "Prelude" was a pleasure; but I could have spared easily the third hearing of Pabst's paraphrase on themes from Tschaikowsky's "Onegin." The paraphrase is, indeed, vulgar music. The Etude and Esquisse by Arensky are charming pieces as they are played by Mr Siloti.

To me Mr. Siloti is at his best in music of the Russian school and in music by Handel, Beethoven, Liszt. By this I do not mean to say that his interpretation of Chopin in uninteresting. On the contrary: but in his performance of the more subtle and delicate passages of this composer I sometimes miss finesse and vaporous charm.

It is a pleasure to announce that Mr. Siloti will be heard once more—at the Kneisel Concert Monday evening—before he leaves this country. He will then play with Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder Tschaikowsky's noble trio in memory of Nicolas Rubinstein.

Philip Hale.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met with great success at a Seidl concert at the Astroia, New York, March 10. Speaking of his performance of Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor, the Commercial Advertiser said: "Mr. Schroeder, as a virtuoso and an artist, is easily head and shoulders above any other 'cellist in this country, resident or visiting. He is substantial and trustworthy, performing ever with consummate excellence, and whatever work he undertakes is certain of having brought out all that is good in it. Mr. Schroeder played as only a great artist can. In the hands of a lesser man the piece is a conglomeration of empty pyrotechnics that is more than likely to bore an audience before it is finished, no matter how faultlessly it is played, but Mr. Schroeder read into it a deep and thoughtful appreciation that commanded the close attention and admiration of his hearers. Throughout the very involved parts, he kept his clean, clear phrasing; his tone was always rich and mellow, with never in the most hurried passages a suspicion of scratching or thinness; and in the all too brief cantabile passages he secured a fascinating tone, warm and glowing and inexpressibly tender."

The Times (New York) said: "Mr. Schroeder's performance was an exhibition of the highest achievements of the 'cello virtuoso. * * * It was as lovely a piece of 'cello playing as one could wish to hear, and it fully deserved the enthusiastic applause which followed it, and which compelled the artist to play again."

The Tribune (New York) was equally complimentary.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIII., NO. 72.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Antar" Given for the First Time in This City.

The Symphony of Korsakoff Proves Itself Possessed of the Element of Unquestioned Novelty—The Mendelssohn Overture Perfectly Read and Played.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage,"	Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2, "Antar"	Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"	Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "The Master Singers"	Wagner

The Korsakoff symphony was the novelty of the concert, this being its first presentation in Boston. It is programme music pure and simple, and attempts to describe a gazelle pursued by a huge bird that is stricken by the lance of Antar, and flies away shrieking as the gazelle vanishes. The bird was the Spirit of Darkness, and the gazelle the fairy Ghul-Nazar. The fairy, in gratitude, grants her preserver the delights of revenge, the delights of power and the delights of love.

Antar entreats the fairy, who participates in the last delights, to deprive him of life when she finds him growing cold toward her. One day she discovers that his heart has undergone a change, whereupon she kisses him passionately, and the fire thereof burns up his heart and he dies in the fairy's arms.

Even with this guide, it is not easy to discover the gazelle and the bird, and the fairy and the various delights, to say nothing of the cold-growing love and the kiss that burns up Antar's heart. In fact, the music has not very intelligible meaning with or without its labels. All that is clear about it is that it is cloyingly sensuous, beautiful in its instrumentation, now and then charming in grace, poetic in sentiment and oriental in color.

There is, however, very little variety in general effect, one movement seeming very like another. There are prettiness and daintiness, to excess, but at last these become monotonous, but the greatest drawback to an enjoyment of the work is the difficulty of finding just where to place the labels, each of which requires a more definite label of its own.

Some day we shall have a musical setting of some of the more poetic of Euclid's problems, and then programme music will have reached its highest stage of development.

The performance of the symphony was exquisite in its finish and its general beauty. The triumph of the orchestra on this occasion, however, was the rendering of the Tschaikowsky fantasia, in which the strings achieved wonders in the remarkably vivid and difficult passages descriptive of the wild whirling of the hell winds.

The Mendelssohn overture was perfectly read and played. The first movement is still fresh and beautiful, but the allegro is wrinkled, bald and moss-covered, and might be put away carefully in some secure hiding place, from which it can nevermore be rescued by mortal man; and in order that it shall not feel lonely, Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" might be given it as a companion. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of the Wagner prelude.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Mendelssohn; symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," C. M. Loeffler, repeated by request, and "The Ride of the Walkyries," Wagner. The soloist is to be Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, who will sing some selections not yet announced.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 14, 1898.

A Russian Programme Played by the Symphony Orchestra.

"The Russians have come!" Saturday was almost completely given over to Russia so far as Boston's musical matters are concerned.

The impression left after two concerts brimful of Neo-Russian music is that the school has something important to say in the domain of art, but has not yet entirely gained the mastery of its ideas; it stammers in its speech and a foreigner may be excused for not understanding it. But it is bringing a new vein into musical expression and it is reconciling Occidental music with Oriental.

Saturday's concert began innocently enough with Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille und glueckliche Fahrt" overture. Many thanks to the programme-book editor for doing away with that mistranslation which calls the work "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage!" If ever a work proved the fatal defect of programme-music this one does; there are thousands of people who have listened to the Adagio which begins this overture, and pinning their faith upon the title "Calm Sea" have imagined a delightful expanse of smiling ocean, while the dull monotony of the music, (particularly that long, long A upon the violins) portrays a tropical dead calm at sea, and in the days of sailing vessels!

The picture is a definite one, as definite as Coleridge's "painted ocean," for here are Goethe's words which gave the composer his incentive:—

> "Tiefe Stille herrscht im Wasser
> Ohne Regung ruh't das Meer,
> Und der Schiffer sieh't bekuemmert
> Glatte Flaeche rings umher.
>
> "Keine Luft von keiner Seite,
> Todesstille, fuerchterlich:
> In der ungeheuern Weite
> Reget keine Welle sich."

Not nearly so strong a picture as that of the English poet, but sufficiently compact and dramatic to cause Schubert to make it into a song, Beethoven to write a quartette with orchestral accompaniment (with some very wide intervals to express emptiness) and Mendelssohn to compose an overture.

We may venture an English translation of the thought of the introduction:—

> "Deepest stillness on the waters,
> Without motion lies the sea,
> And the sailor sees around him
> Only flat monotony.
>
> Not a breath of air is stirring,
> Deathlike silence, like the grave,
> In the whole wide, vast horizon
> Ripples not a single wave."

It speaks well for the power of the imagination, and ill for the value of programme-music, that the words "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage" cause many an English-speaking auditor to call up a picture of nautical bliss where the composer intended a suggestion of desolation. The programme-book caused the auditor to dilate with the proper emotion by simply transposing "Calm Sea" into "Sea-calm."

The work received a splendid performance, although there were premonitions of trouble upon the kettle-drum, where the artist struck for his altars and his fires and also for the green graves of his sires, and always struck fortissimo! The trumpet fanfare was finely given, the bright finale ("Geschwinde, Geschwinde, schon seh' Ich das Land") picturing the ship coming into port, was excellently rendered.

But the voyage ended in the "Antar"-ctic regions, for Rimski-Korsakoff's symphony (??) entitled "Antar" followed; and now for dissonance followed upon dissonance. The concert was consistent in this, that each piece was pictorial music ("programme-music") towards which the whole modern school seems tending.

"Farewell the tranquil mind! Farewell content!"

The first picture showed us the mighty hunter, Antar, amidst the ruins of Palmyra, the aforesaid ruins being inhabited chiefly by bassoons, trombones and clarinettes. The charmingly Oriental flute melody which followed, pictured the fairy Ghul-Nazar pursued by the spirit of darkness.

This part was very graphic and showed great power of scoring, and it was played with dramatic effect, but after this chase of an innocent flute by the wicked violoncellos and contrabasses the music became very spasmodic, full of sudden pauses and other bits of caprice that did not impress us at all.

As Antar has rescued the fairy, she not only gives him her love, but presents him with three "fruitions of life," the one pictured in the second movement being that of "Revenge." Having full powers of Revenge Antar proceeds at once to take vengeance on the harmony-teachers and defies all the rules of composition in a set of dissonances that can only be described as blood-curdling. The muscular kettle-drummer was now joined by a burly cymbalist and an artist upon the gong; this thundering trinity crashed along like a car of Juggernaut and were presently helped by stopped horns and other baleful things.

The third movement showed the fruition of "Power," and in accordance with Russian ideas, it was military power. There was some attractive music in this movement and a pretty contrast was made with a decidedly Eastern dance, as if a troupe of Bayaderes were an adjunct of Antar's power.

The finale dealt with "Love," and began with a poetic dialogue between English horn and clarinette, in which the dreamy melancholy of the former was an excellent foil to the gloom of the latter. The Oriental flavor was still omnipresent, but there was more coherency here than in the preceding movements. The hero dies, by his own request, (when his love shall have grown cold,) by a fiery kiss given by Ghul-Nazar, but there was not anything very striking in Antar's Liebestod.

Spite of all the brilliancy of orchestral scoring, spite of all the ingenuity of figure treatment and of originality of melody (or melodic phrases rather) one cannot but feel that this is a savage utterance in music; accepting it as untamed genius we can allow such a musical expression to pass as a free orchestral fantasie, but as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn and Brahms have given us a very clever and decided form called "Symphony" (the very opposite of such a caprice), we may decidedly object to the work coming into our concerts under such a misnomer.

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" came in properly, under the title of "Fantasie," and was also a more inspired, a more musicianly work, but, as it was in the same pictorial and explosive school (another bit of musical impressionism), it lost somewhat because the audience had already been filled with clashes, clatter and chromatics, even though it was allowed to end with such a comical fury of explosions upon the gong and cymbals that one might have thought that our band of artists were giving a tone-picture of an explosion in a powder-mill!

We are glad to speak of the beauties of this work, of the wonderful portrayal of the howling winds of the Inferno, of the tender sadness of the story of the two lovers, of the grand technical display of our orchestra, but we must add that it was the right thing in the wrong place, one wearies even of musical pepper, even fortissisissimo effects lose their pungency after a while, and the chief impression that the deafened reviewer received was that Hades was too noisy ever to become a pleasant winter resort.

Nor was this all of the heavy music! The most tumultuous of all Wagner's preludes, that to "Die Meistersinger," followed. It seemed somewhat weak simply because there had been so much racket that a Slumber-song written for Cymbals, Kettle-drum, Gong, Trombones and Bass Tuba, would have seemed correct after all the explosions that had marked the course of this detonating programme. It was played with precision and with masterly detail, but it fell, if not upon deaf ears, at least upon ears that had been stunned, and did not make its due effect.

Not until bombardment of Boston takes place will our citizens have an opportunity of hearing so many crashes again, as were heard in Music Hall on Saturday night. Fortunately this is not the usual style of the concerts under our admirable conductor, otherwise one would be obliged to wear ear-muffs during the performance.

Louis C. Elson.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1898.

The program of the seventeenth Symphony concert (March 5) included the first three movements of Beethoven's ninth symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Saint-Saëns' piano concerto No. 4, in C minor, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

It is a striking comment on the condition of music in Boston that Mr. Paur for the second time during his administration performed the marvelous ninth symphony without the finale. The idea of following the adagio with the Leonore No. 3 was not a happy one.

And yet the three movements showed us in opera week how superior absolute music may be in true dramatic power to the opera with its meretricious and distracting appeals to the eye.

The performance was carefully studied, elaborately thought out. The first movement was taken at a slower pace than is customary and in some respects the music gained thereby. The only flaw of any magnitude in the performance of the scherzo was the quality of tone produced by the kettledrum man, whose ears must be blunt, incapable of distinguishing between sound and noise. The kettledrum is not necessarily an unmusical instrument.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler played with great spirit and tonal beauty the clever and insincere concerto of Saint-Saëns. Her scales were beautifully clear and even and there was warmth even in the naturally cold bravura. Exuberance of gesture detracted from the strength of her performance.

Philip Hale.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not as well attended as the preceding concerts. Mr. Schroeder was the soloist. The evenings that Mr. Joseffy and Madame Blauvelt were announced attracted the largest audiences. But what other orchestra can command as its own such soloists and composers as the Boston Symphony Orchestra? As a matter of fact no orchestra equals the personnel of the Boston band.

Since the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were inaugurated in this city Messrs. Gericke, Nikisch and Paur have respectively been at its helm. Each conductor has demonstrated his special capacity; but the orchestra as a body has steadily improved, and there is much in orchestral music that Baltimore would have had but little opportunity of knowing, appreciating or understanding but for this orchestra, and I know I am expressing the sentiment of each season's faithful supporters when I say that I hope the announcement that the visits of the orchestra will discontinue after this season is unfounded, or if well founded, the management will decide to alter its determination.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1898.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar" Performed by the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Alexandre Siloti Gave His Last Piano Recital.

The program of the 18th Symphony Concert, Mr. Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage"	Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2, "Antar," op. 15 (First time in Boston.)	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini,"	Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg	Wagner

Mendelssohn's overture "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" bears the same relation to music that "Barriers Burned Away" or "The Opening of a Chestnut Burr" does to literature. Why drag it in its dull length into the concert-room in this, the year of our Lord 1898.

⁂

The program book says that "Antar" was first publicly performed in Magdeburg in 1881. It was performed before that date—in St. Petersburg in 1868. The local critics did not like it; but we find von Bülow praising the work loudly in 1878, speaking of it as a "superb tone painting" and of the composer as "a true tone-poet." When the piece was performed at Magdeburg Mr. Nikisch was the conductor. It was played in New York in the season of '91-92.

In "Antar" the flight of imagination is not as high, the workmanship is not as secure and authoritative as in "Scheherazade." The themes are not sufficiently developed. The constant repetition in different keys, by various instruments, and with varying counterpoint soon becomes monotonous. There is interesting experimenting in tonal color, but there is little true musical thought in this strange symphony—at least so it seems to me after one hearing.

⁂

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini," which has been played before this at a Symphony concert, and was produced here for the first time by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Mr. Listemann, Dec. 31, 1891, was composed in 1876. It was conceived originally as an opera, but the librettist, Zvantsev, imposed conditions. He insisted that his book should be treated according to Wagnerian theories. Tschaikowsky would not yield to him; the opera was abandoned; he felt obliged to treat Francesca in some musical manner, and this symphonic poem was the result. He once told his friend Kashkin that Doré's illustrations to the Inferno influenced him considerably in his music-picture of Hell's Whirlwind.

And this music-picture of Hell's Whirlwind—"cruellest winds under a dark and gloomy air"—is marvelously successful. It is the strongest feature of the fantasia. The music that is supposed to tell the story of Madonna Francesca's love for Polo—"a handsome man, very pleasant, and of a courteous breeding"—of the kiss upon her mouth, all quivering, this music is not irresistible in its delineation of consuming passion and poignant woe. There is no love theme like the wondrous melody in the "Romeo and Juliet" by the same composer.

As purely pictorial music, if the phrase may be allowed, there is nothing in the literature of the orchestra that compares with this attempt to reproduce the fury of the wind. And, hearing it and remembering the wind-swept flight of the lovers in Doré's drawings, you realize the meaning of Tschaikowsky's remark.

The fantasia was read and played most dramatically, and the technic of the orchestra shone dazzlingly, even although "Hell is murky" might serve as a motto to the composition.

⁂

Mr. Alexandre Siloti gave his third and last piano recital yesterday afternoon in Steinert Hall, which was full to overflowing. He was assisted by Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder. The program was as follows:

Trio, D minor, op. 32	Arensky
"Islamey"	Balakireff
Etude, La Nuit	Glazounoff
Prelude, op. 3	Rachmaninoff
Etude, op. 31	Arensky
"Esquisse," No. 1	Arensky
"Complainte," nocturne	Tschaikowsky-Siloti
Paraphrase on themes from "Onegin"	Tschaikowsky-Pabst
Etude, D flat major	Liszt
Consolation, No. 5	Liszt
Fantaise	Chopin
Etude, No. 3, op. 10	Chopin
Ballade, A flat	Chopin
Nocturne, D flat	Chopin
Scherzo, B flat	Chopin

The trio by Arensky was written in memory of Charles Davidoff, the celebrated 'cellist. It is a clearly made and tuneful work, which seldom rises above salon-elegance and salon-emotion. The first two movements are better than the elegy and the finale. The elegy is never a deep, heartfelt wail, and it is not firmly knit together; nor is the conversation between the violin and 'cello without monotony and the suggestion of chattering during the funeral exercises. The scherzo, piquant in rhythm and melody, is delightful. The trio of this scherzo reminds one of the trio of the scherzo in Saint-Saëns's G minor piano concerto, by the rhythm and the introduction of the theme rather than by the theme itself. The work, it is perhaps needless to say, was played in masterly fashion.

⁂

Mr. Siloti gave an astounding performance of Balakireff's "Islamey," playing the polyphonic passages with incredible clearness and brilliancy. His repetition of Glazounoff's "La Nuit" and Rachmaninoff's "Prelude" was a pleasure; but I could have spared easily the third hearing of Pabst's paraphrase on themes from Tschaikowsky's "Onegin." The paraphrase is, indeed, vulgar music. The Etude and Esquisse by Arensky are charming pieces as they are played by Mr Siloti.

To me Mr. Siloti is at his best in music of the Russian school and in music by Handel, Beethoven, Liszt. By this I do not mean to say that his interpretation of Chopin in uninteresting. On the contrary: but in his performance of the more subtle and delicate passages of this composer I sometimes miss finesse and vaporous charm.

It is a pleasure to announce that Mr. Siloti will be heard once more—at the Kneisel Concert Monday evening—before he leaves this country. He will then play with Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder Tschaikowsky's noble trio in memory of Nicolas Rubinstein.

Philip Hale.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, met with great success at a Seidl concert at the Astroia, New York, March 10. Speaking of his performance of Saint-Saëns's concerto in A minor, the Commercial Advertiser said: "Mr. Schroeder, as a virtuoso and an artist, is easily head and shoulders above any other 'cellist in this country, resident or visiting. He is substantial and trustworthy, performing ever with consummate excellence, and whatever work he undertakes is certain of having brought out all that is good in it. Mr. Schroeder played as only a great artist can. In the hands of a lesser man the piece is a conglomeration of empty pyrotechnics that is more than likely to bore an audience before it is finished, no matter how faultlessly it is played, but Mr. Schroeder read into it a deep and thoughtful appreciation that commanded the close attention and admiration of his hearers. Throughout the very involved parts, he kept his clean, clear phrasing; his tone was always rich and mellow, with never in the most hurried passages a suspicion of scratching or thinness; and in the all too brief cantabile passages he secured a fascinating tone, warm and glowing and inexpressibly tender."

The Times (New York) said: "Mr. Schroeder's performance was an exhibition of the highest achievements of the 'cello virtuoso. * * * It was as lovely a piece of 'cello playing as one could wish to hear, and it fully deserved the enthusiastic applause which followed it, and which compelled the artist to play again."

The Tribune (New York) was equally complimentary.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIII., NO. 72.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Antar" Given for the First Time in This City.

The Symphony of Korsakoff Proves Itself Possessed of the Element of Unquestioned Novelty—The Mendelssohn Overture Perfectly Read and Played.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage."	Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2, "Antar"	Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini"	Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "The Master Singers"	Wagner

The Korsakoff symphony was the novelty of the concert, this being its first presentation in Boston. It is programme music pure and simple, and attempts to describe a gazelle pursued by a huge bird that is stricken by the lance of Antar, and flies away shrieking as the gazelle vanishes. The bird was the Spirit of Darkness, and the gazelle the fairy Ghul-Nazar. The fairy, in gratitude, grants her preserver the delights of revenge, the delights of power and the delights of love.

Antar entreats the fairy, who participates in the last delights, to deprive him of life when she finds him growing cold toward her. One day she discovers that his heart has undergone a change, whereupon she kisses him passionately, and the fire thereof burns up his heart and he dies in the fairy's arms.

Even with this guide, it is not easy to discover the gazelle and the bird, and the fairy and the various delights, to say nothing of the cold-growing love and the kiss that burns up Antar's heart. In fact, the music has not very intelligible meaning with or without its labels. All that is clear about it is that it is cloyingly sensuous, beautiful in its instrumentation, now and then charming in grace, poetic in sentiment and oriental in color.

There is, however, very little variety in general effect, one movement seeming very like another. There are prettiness and daintiness, to excess, but at last these become monotonous, but the greatest drawback to an enjoyment of the work is the difficulty of finding just where to place the labels, each of which requires a more definite label of its own.

Some day we shall have a musical setting of some of the more poetic of Euclid's problems, and then programme music will have reached its highest stage of development.

The performance of the symphony was exquisite in its finish and its general beauty. The triumph of the orchestra on this occasion, however, was the rendering of the Tschaikowsky fantasia, in which the strings achieved wonders in the remarkably vivid and difficult passages descriptive of the wild whirling of the hell winds.

The Mendelssohn overture was perfectly read and played. The first movement is still fresh and beautiful, but the allegro is wrinkled, bald and moss-covered, and might be put away carefully in some secure hiding place, from which it can nevermore be rescued by mortal man; and in order that it shall not feel lonely, Beethoven's "Consecration of the House" might be given it as a companion. The concert ended with a magnificent performance of the Wagner prelude.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Mendelssohn; symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," C. M. Loeffler, repeated by request, and "The Ride of the Walkyries," Wagner. The soloist is to be Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, who will sing some selections not yet announced.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 14, 1898.

A Russian Programme Played by the Symphony Orchestra.

"The Russians have come!" Saturday was almost completely given over to Russia so far as Boston's musical matters are concerned.

The impression left after two concerts brimful of Neo-Russian music is that the school has something important to say in the domain of art, but has not yet entirely gained the mastery of its ideas; it stammers in its speech and a foreigner may be excused for not understanding it. But it is bringing a new vein into musical expression and it is reconciling Occidental music with Oriental.

Saturday's concert began innocently enough with Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille und glueckliche Fahrt" overture. Many thanks to the programme-book editor for doing away with that mistranslation which calls the work "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage!" If ever a work proved the fatal defect of programme-music this one does; there are thousands of people who have listened to the Adagio which begins this overture, and pinning their faith upon the title "Calm Sea" have imagined a delightful expanse of smiling ocean, while the dull monotony of the music, (particularly that long, long A upon the violins) portrays a tropical dead calm at sea, and in the days of sailing vessels!

The picture is a definite one, as definite as Coleridge's "painted ocean," for here are Goethe's words which gave the composer his incentive:—

> "Tiefe Stille herrscht im Wasser
> Ohne Regung ruh't das Meer,
> Und der Schiffer sieh't bekuemmert
> Glatte Flaeche rings umher.
>
> "Keine Luft von keiner Seite,
> Todesstille, fuerchterlich:
> In der ungeheuern Weite
> Reget keine Welle sich."

Not nearly so strong a picture as that of the English poet, but sufficiently compact and dramatic to cause Schubert to make it into a song, Beethoven to write a quartette with orchestral accompaniment (with some very wide intervals to express emptiness) and Mendelssohn to compose an overture.

We may venture an English translation of the thought of the introduction:—

> "Deepest stillness on the waters,
> Without motion lies the sea,
> And the sailor sees around him
> Only flat monotony.
>
> Not a breath of air is stirring,
> Deathlike silence, like the grave,
> In the whole wide, vast horizon
> Ripples not a single wave."

It speaks well for the power of the imagination, and ill for the value of programme-music, that the words "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage" cause many an English-speaking auditor to call up a picture of nautical bliss where the composer intended a suggestion of desolation. The programme-book caused the auditor to dilate with the proper emotion by simply transposing "Calm Sea" into "Sea-calm."

The work received a splendid performance, although there were premonitions of trouble upon the kettle-drum, where the artist struck for his altars and his fires and also for the green graves of his sires, and always struck fortissimo! The trumpet fanfare was finely given, the bright finale ("Geschwinde, Geschwinde, schon seh' Ich das Land") picturing the ship coming into port, was excellently rendered.

But the voyage ended in the "Antar"-ctic regions, for Rimski-Korsakoff's symphony (??) entitled "Antar" followed; and now for dissonance followed upon dissonance. The concert was consistent in this, that each piece was pictorial music ("programme-music") towards which the whole modern school seems tending.

> "Farewell the tranquil mind! Farewell content!"

The first picture showed us the mighty hunter, Antar, amidst the ruins of Palmyra, the aforesaid ruins being inhabited chiefly by bassoons, trombones and clarinettes. The charmingly Oriental flute melody which followed, pictured the fairy Ghul-Nazar pursued by the spirit of darkness.

This part was very graphic and showed great power of scoring, and it was played with dramatic effect, but after this chase of an innocent flute by the wicked violoncellos and contrabasses the music became very spasmodic, full of sudden pauses and other bits of caprice that did not impress us at all.

As Antar has rescued the fairy, she not only gives him her love, but presents him with three "fruitions of life," the one pictured in the second movement being that of "Revenge." Having full powers of Revenge Antar proceeds at once to take vengeance on the harmony-teachers and defies all the rules of composition in a set of dissonances that can only be described as blood-curdling. The muscular kettle-drummer was now joined by a burly cymbalist and an artist upon the gong; this thundering trinity crashed along like a car of Juggernaut and were presently helped by stopped horns and other baleful things.

The third movement showed the fruition of "Power," and in accordance with Russian ideas, it was military power. There was some attractive music in this movement and a pretty contrast was made with a decidedly Eastern dance, as if a troupe of Bayaderes were an adjunct of Antar's power.

The finale dealt with "Love," and began with a poetic dialogue between English horn and clarinette, in which the dreamy melancholy of the former was an excellent foil to the gloom of the latter. The Oriental flavor was still omnipresent, but there was more coherency here than in the preceding movements. The hero dies, by his own request, (when his love shall have grown cold,) by a fiery kiss given by Ghul-Nazar, but there was not anything very striking in Antar's Liebestod.

Spite of all the brilliancy of orchestral scoring, spite of all the ingenuity of figure treatment and of originality of melody (or melodic phrases rather) one cannot but feel that this is a savage utterance in music; accepting it as untamed genius we can allow such a musical expression to pass as a free orchestral fantasie, but as Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn and Brahms have given us a very clever and decided form called "Symphony" (the very opposite of such a caprice), we may decidedly object to the work coming into our concerts under such a misnomer.

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" came in properly, under the title of "Fantasie," and was also a more inspired, a more musicianly work, but, as it was in the same pictorial and explosive school (another bit of musical impressionism), it lost somewhat because the audience had already been filled with clashes, clatter and chromatics, even though it was allowed to end with such a comical fury of explosions upon the gong and cymbals that one might have thought that our band of artists were giving a tone-picture of an explosion in a powder-mill!

We are glad to speak of the beauties of this work, of the wonderful portrayal of the howling winds of the Inferno, of the tender sadness of the story of the two lovers, of the grand technical display of our orchestra, but we must add that it was the right thing in the wrong place, one wearies even of musical pepper, even fortississimo effects lose their pungency after a while, and the chief impression that the deafened reviewer received was that Hades was too noisy ever to become a pleasant winter resort.

Nor was this all of the heavy music! The most tumultuous of all Wagner's preludes, that to "Die Meistersinger," followed. It seemed somewhat weak simply because there had been so much racket that a Slumber-song written for Cymbals, Kettle-drum, Gong, Trombones and Bass Tuba, would have seemed correct after all the explosions that had marked the course of this detonating programme. It was played with precision and with masterly detail, but it fell, if not upon deaf ears, at least upon ears that had been stunned, and did not make its due effect.

Not until bombardment of Boston takes place will our citizens have an opportunity of hearing so many crashes again, as were heard in Music Hall on Saturday night. Fortunately this is not the usual style of the concerts under our admirable conductor, otherwise one would be obliged to wear ear-muffs during the performance.

Louis C. Elson.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9, 1898.

The program of the seventeenth Symphony concert (March 5) included the first three movements of Beethoven's ninth symphony, Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, Saint-Saëns' piano concerto No. 4, in C minor, and Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture.

It is a striking comment on the condition of music in Boston that Mr. Paur for the second time during his administration performed the marvelous ninth symphony without the finale. The idea of following the adagio with the Leonore No. 3 was not a happy one.

And yet the three movements showed us in opera week how superior absolute music may be in true dramatic power to the opera with its meretricious and distracting appeals to the eye.

The performance was carefully studied, elaborately thought out. The first movement was taken at a slower pace than is customary and in some respects the music gained thereby. The only flaw of any magnitude in the performance of the scherzo was the quality of tone produced by the kettledrum man, whose ears must be blunt, incapable of distinguishing between sound and noise. The kettledrum is not necessarily an unmusical instrument.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler played with great spirit and tonal beauty the clever and insincere concerto of Saint-Saëns. Her scales were beautifully clear and even and there was warmth even in the naturally cold bravura. Exuberance of gesture detracted from the strength of her performance.

PHILIP HALE.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not as well attended as the preceding concerts. Mr. Schroeder was the soloist. The evenings that Mr. Joseffy and Madame Blauvelt were announced attracted the largest audiences. But what other orchestra can command as its own such soloists and composers as the Boston Symphony Orchestra? As a matter of fact no orchestra equals the personnel of the Boston band.

Since the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were inaugurated in this city Messrs. Gericke, Nikisch and Paur have respectively been at its helm. Each conductor has demonstrated his special capacity; but the orchestra as a body has steadily improved, and there is much in orchestral music that Baltimore would have had but little opportunity of knowing, appreciating or understanding but for this orchestra, and I know I am expressing the sentiment of each season's faithful supporters when I say that I hope the announcement that the visits of the orchestra will discontinue after this season is unfounded, or if well founded, the management will decide to alter its determination.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

Mr. Paur's eighteenth programme was without a soloist, but included one new work, which was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Anthar" symphony. The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea" overture; Tschaikowsky's poem "Francesca da Rimini" followed the symphony; and (just as if we had not had a good fill-up on Wagner at the opera!) the final selection was the prelude to "The Mastersingers." This made a pretty trying programme; for everything was exciting, nervous, agitated, thrilling or vehement, except the slow movement of the overture and some parts of the "Anthar."

This symphony is rather a vast romance in four parts than anything else; for the composer changes theme, rate, rhythm and character to suit his purposes within the scope of every movement, and pays almost no attention to developing the conventional sonata form, the scherzo, or even to keeping the usual arrangements of quick and slow movements. He illustrates the poetic legend of a great Master of the Desert, Anthar, who has fled to the ruins of Palmyra, to escape the ingratitude and baseness of men. In the first movement he is brooding alone in solitude; a gazelle appears as flying from a huge bird of prey; he beats the bird away with his lance; then the gazelle also vanishes, to be succeeded in his rapt vision by the fairy whom he had saved in her transformed shape. She promises him the usual three wishes, and as she departs, he returns completely to himself. In the second movement, he obtains and wreaks vengeance on his enemies, and in the third he enjoys the splendid and the the placid delights of active and passive power. In the fourth he wins the fairy's love and dwells in delight with her for a while amid his ruins; but when his heart wanders and his affection wanes, the fire of her finer nature consumes him and he dies. This is a large scheme, and in its development it is by turns rhapsodical, passionate, mysterious, dramatic, picturesque and suggestive. Invention sweeps freely along its pages, bringing many original fancies which are set forth in an orchestral score which has remarkable effect and power in its combinations, is often really intense, and yet keeps well on the hither side of the bizarre or extravagant. With probably a similar fancy in mind to that which guided David to the reiteration of a single note as the key to his tone-picture of empty space, in "The Desert," Rimsky-Korsakoff clings almost constantly in the first movement to his diapason of F sharp, which vibrates impassively alike under the sombre chords and uncertain phrases of his introductory large and beneath the episodes which follow the appearance of the hunted gazelle. So and at later periods,—especially in the last movement—when the desert and the ruins and the solitude are to be felt as essential to the situation, that same deep, trembling tone makes it way below the cause of the current of action and sentiment. The bounding of the gazette, the circling of the monstrous bird, its downward swoop, the sharp lance stroke, the cry of fear and pain and discomfiture, the leaping away of the rescued creature, and the fluttering wings of the approaching fairy, are succinctly and significantly expressed, and the first movement rises to its simple climax so quickly and lightly, that at the rehearsal people simply stared one another in the face, doubtful whether that soft, full, high chord were the end. The subsequent movements are no less imaginative and artful. The harsh rush and crash of gratified revenge and the slower, heavier pulse of cold, deliberate menace; the swell and pomp of dominant power and the large suavity of assured control; the richness of mutual emotion and the fading away of passion into nonentity at last—these are all so drawn and colored that who ever likes a musical poem of such kind might well be delighted. There is much nice skill in the treatment of individual instruments: the violas have some very well-thought and original passages; the bassoons are allowed to show their calmest and broadest tones; the harp contributes amply and entirely in character, and the many percussion instruments are carefully fitted to their places. There is nothing like a scherzo; after the slow opening, the first, second and third movements are all quick, and the last begins so, changing midway to an andante amoroso and a largo borrowed from the beginning. The work ends as it began, in a pianissimo.

The performance was superb in elasticity, color, lucidity and sympathy, and Mr. Paur again showed his command of the romantic as well as of the classic. The other selections were also admirably played, with a tremendous vigor for the bitter storms of the "Francesca da Rimini" and great versatility for the Wagner prelude.

Next week there will be played Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Mr. Loeffler's "Tintagiles," (its second hearing,) and the "Ride of the Walkyries." Mr. Ffrangcon Davies will sing twice.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1898.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Three of the four orchestral works played by the Boston symphony orchestra at the 18th concert were in Ercles' vein, the opening number, Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm" overture, alone being in the category of the more tranquil compositions. The novelty on the program was the "Antar" symphony, written by Rimsky-Korsakoff and performed here for the first time. The other selections were Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini" and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Mendelssohn work retains all its charm, and although it was written about 60 years ago the orchestration is as elaborate and modern as many of the so-called "advanced" scores. To be sure there are but few of the newly discovered (?) instrumental combinations used, but the master's work is ever new and enchanting, and probably will be played and enjoyed when many of the more audacious compositions are practically forgotten. Mr Paur's men interpreted the overture in magnificent style, preserving all the harmonious delicacy and suggestiveness of the different tone pictures.

Another familiar number, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," was given with excellent effect, and the Tschaikowsky fantasia, with its gloomy and passionate outpourings, received the proper tempestuous treatment. With opera in German at the Boston theater and Russian compositions on the symphony program, the admirers of "music of the future" surely must have found satiety at the close of last week.

The Wagner number may be considered the least turbulent of the last three numbers of the symphony concert, for despite the fact that Tschaikowsky was even more vigorous than the prelude, the "Antar" symphony eclipsed them both in weird orchestration and unharmonic effects. It is strange, uncanny in truth, and combines such strange instrumentation, queer modulations and rapid changes in tempo and key that a single hearing leaves the auditor in doubt as to the value of the work. That it is tremendously difficult to play there is no question, and that the orchestra mastered those difficulties is equally plain, but there criticism at present must cease. The Russian composer, Korsakoff, evidently has evolved a musical enigma which is too complex of solution now.

Mr Ffrangcon Davies, basso, will be the soloist this week. The orchestral numbers will be as follows: Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Charles Martin Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," for orchestra and two violes d'amour obbligate (the violes d'amour by Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr C. M. Loeffler); Richard Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries."

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13.

Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The program was:

Overture—"Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" .... Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2—"Antar," op 15 .... Romsky—Korsakoff
Fantasia—"Francesca da Romini" op 32 .... Tschaikovsky
Prelude—"Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner

The "Antar" symphony was given for the first time in Boston and it is possible that one would like it better if it did not suggest that one had heard it all before. It was worth hearing, all new music by authoritative composers is worth the hearing; but having heard this particular work there will not be much eagerness to hear it again. It is program music suggesting the majestic aspect of the Syrian desert and the ruins of Palmyra. Antar, "the jewel of the desert," braves the Spirits of Darkness, kills a gigantic bird that was pursuing "a lovely and bounding gazelle," the throwing of the javelin "cleverly suggested by a double-octave skip in the violins, violas and flutes," then Antar falls asleep, dreams that he is in the palace of the fairy Ghul-Nazar, who is the gazelle that he saved from the claws of the gigantic bird. The grateful fairy promises him "the three fruitions of life" and when he accepts the vision vanishes and he wakes up. The first gift is that of revenge, the second the delights of power, the third the delights of love, and in the end Antar's heart is burned up by the fire of the fairy's lips and he dies pianissimo in her arms. With these clews the music becomes radiant with meaning, when one can detect the difference between the gazelle and the roc, between the spirits of darkness and the ruins of Palmyra, and under the sway of the imagination one can note that the composer is occasionally charming, and forget that he is frequently trivial, and that at times it is difficult to tell if he is himself or Tschaikovsky. There are several very delightful moments in the work, but the padding far outbalances the inspiration. The ending of the symphony was a very pleasant surprise, for Antar died quietly and the tam-tams, kettle drums, cymbals, bass tubas and triangle were silent. The Tschaikovsky fantasia would have sounded better had it not immediately followed the symphony, although the arrangement gave the curious a chance to contrast the Tschaikovsky with the Rimsky-Korsakoff kiss.

The program for the next concert is Symphony. A. minor, No. 3, Mendelssohn; Symphonic Poem. "The Death of Tentagiles," Mr. Chas. M. Loeffler; a song solo, and the "Ride of the Walkyries," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. Ffrangeon Davies.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphony No. 2, "Antar," opus 15.
(First time in Boston.)
Tchaikovsky: Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32.
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Saturday was a Russian day, in all conscience! Eight Russian numbers in the afternoon from Mr. Siloti, and two in the evening from our orchestra—with Siloti himself applauding for all he was worth from a seat on the floor of the hall!

It was a curious impression, hearing Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" after a silence of some years. We have always been warmly enthusiastic about this overture; if not quite up to the "Hebriden" or the "Midsummer Night's Dream," it is still a work of exquisite genius, full of picturesque poetry. It holds by no means the last place in the list of those concert overtures in which Mendelssohn found, upon the whole, his most original and congenial field. Before the concert, we expressed some of this to a member of the orchestra, and he warned us that we should be disappointed; that the work would no longer sound now as it used to in the days of yore. Well, he was right; we were disappointed—not in the overture itself, but in the effect it made. This effect was a curious one: the composition seemed as strong, beautiful and poetic as ever; only a change seemed to have come over ourselves—the music all sounded as if we had suddenly grown partially deaf, the whole edge of the thing seemed dulled. This experience, which is perfectly explicable, has not diminished our faith in Mendelssohn's overture in the least; we firmly believe that the "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" will continue to be played and enjoyed when people will ask you who and what sort of a man Tchaikovsky was, and what he wrote. We are fully pursuaded that the dull impression last Saturday evening came solely from contrasting Mendelssohn's orchestration, in a hall far too large for it, with recent hearings of more modern orchestration, in the same hall—which is just right for it.

And so we have at last heard Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar"! That it cannot compare with his "Scheherazade" in vigor of invention and force of fascination seems pretty clear. But one finds in it all the germs of what fascinates one so in the later and stronger work. There is the same brilliant imaginativeness, the same conspicuous power of producing a vivid picture, the same welcome conciseness, the same absolute originality in orchestration, the same power of holding a movement together, as a recognizable whole, by mysterious means apparently unknown to other composers. The musical material is, to be sure, far inferior, and the workmanship less masterly; but the "Scheherazade" shows none the less the logical fuller development of the man who wrote the "Antar." After hearing the one, you could spot the composer on hearing the other, without the help of a programme. What an astonishingly individual thing Rimsky-Korsakoff's orchestra is! How full of aroma and savor! Nobody else scores just as he does; even Liszt and Berlioz are not more individual in their coloring. Then he has a certain elegance which his stronger compatriot, Tchaikovsky, for the most part lacks. In feeling he is perhaps rather shallow and epidermal; his orchestral works that we have heard here hardly rise above the level of fascinating jeux d'esprit; they have a certain vers de société flavor. But they do not seem to aspire to much more; we cannot but find Rimsky-Korsakoff more satisfying in his peculiar fashion than we do Tchaikovsky on his higher plane. The performance of the "Antar" was admirable at every point.

Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" can hardly be justly placed upon the same level with his "Romeo and Juliet"; it shows both his strength and his weakness. As a Dantesque picture of hell, it is brilliantly vivid; perhaps no finer a realization of the picture painted in words by Dante than Gustave Doré's illustrations of the same subject, or Martin's of "Paradise Lost"; there is a certain wilful portentousness about it that is more striking than convincing. It would never keep you awake of nights. But vivid and brilliant it certainly is; nothing ever sounded more cavernous, more speluncal, than those brazen blasts at the beginning; the whirlwind business is all capital. Only the episode in the middle, from which the composition takes it name, strikes us as weak and inadequate. Here we have the same sort of theme that we find in the cantilena of the first movement of the "Pathetic" symphony; a melody positively dripping with emotion, but commonplace and intrinsically ignoble. It does not fit Francesca in the least; or, if at all, only in a generally emotional way. Remember that Dante, like a true Olympian deity, wiped out Francesca from actual history and placed her amongst the stars; ever since the "Divina Commedia" she is to be thought of only with loving reverence, as one poetically canonised. Tchaikovsky was the last man in the world to reflect anything of the simple nobility of feeling expressed by Dante in this matchless episode. One can say of this Francesca of Tchaikovsky's, as was once said of Falguière's Diana, "There is no objection to M. Falguière's taking any beautifully formed unmentionable young person he pleases as a model for a nude statue; but, when he bestows upon the lifelike reproduction of this same unmentionable young person the name of the goddess of Chastity, you feel that it is very like an inartistic profanation." The performance of the fantasia was irreproachable, and more than that.

We have heard the "Meistersinger" prelude better played. What is the need of forcing the brass so in Wagner's instrumentation? It makes it sound coarse and vulgar, besides destroying the balance of the orchestra. And just here it occurs to us: may not the frequent hearing of this too strident sort of playing of Wagner's orchestral works, and of orchestral excerpts from his music-dramas, be at the bottom of the fault some people find with stage performances of his operas in which the orchestra is wisely kept under so as not to drown out the singers—that such performances are weak and un-Wagnerish?

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56; C. M. Loeffler, symphonic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," for orchestra and two violes d'amour (the violes d'armour by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler); Wagner, "Der Ritt der Walküren." Mr. Ffrangcon Davies will sing two solos, to be announced later.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

Seventy-fifth year—Vol. LIII. Uo. 290

MONDAY, MAHCH 14, 1898.

First Boston Performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphony "Antar"—A Fine Concert.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighteenth concert. The programme:

Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" ....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2, "Antar," op. 15.... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini,".. Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner

The concert smelled of vodkha and left a taste of paprika hot in the mouth. So much of the Slav has not been collected in Music Hall for some time. On the whole, it was a trifle monotonous, and when came the mild and gentle Wagner, so clear to comprehend after the roar and tumult of the preceding Russians, there was a feeling of decided gratification. But think of Wagner sounding brightly, melodious and simple! It shows how the world has wagged since "Die Meistersinger."

The "Antar" symphony is not very much of a symphony, after all, at least according to the form we have come to accept. It is a tonal poem-picture, pure and simple, and never by any chance rises to symphonic dignity and grandeur. The bounding gazelle, the great bird, the hurling of the javelin, the dream of Antar, his revenge, power, love and death—all are pretty well depicted as such things go. There are moments of great beauty, and a plenty of rich and effective orchestration, but the total result is pointless and monotonous. It is well worth hearing, experimentally, and it was played with superb fire and brilliancy.

The "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia has been discussed in this department before. There only need be repeated a word of admiration for the marvellous reproduction on stringed instruments of those "cruellest winds" in hell's domain, and of praise for the extreme virtuosity of the players.

The lovely sea-piece of Mendelssohn might well have been placed at the end, in order to emphasize the occasional delights of delicate and beautiful writing. However, as I said before, the "Meistersinger" prelude served the purpose pretty well. Both were given with much splendor by the orchestra.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

Mr. Paur's eighteenth programme was without a soloist, but included one new work, which was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Anthar" symphony. The opening number was Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea" overture; Tschaikowsky's poem "Francesca da Rimini" followed the symphony; and (just as if we had not had a good fill-up on Wagner at the opera!) the final selection was the prelude to "The Mastersingers." This made a pretty trying programme; for everything was exciting, nervous, agitated, thrilling or vehement, except the slow movement of the overture and some parts of the "Anthar."

This symphony is rather a vast romance in four parts than anything else; for the composer changes theme, rate, rhythm and character to suit his purposes within the scope of every movement, and pays almost no attention to developing the conventional sonata form, the scherzo, or even to keeping the usual arrangements of quick and slow movements. He illustrates the poetic legend of a great Master of the Desert, Anthar, who has fled to the ruins of Palmyra, to escape the ingratitude and baseness of men. In the first movement he is brooding alone in solitude; a gazelle appears as flying from a huge bird of prey; he beats the bird away with his lance; then the gazelle also vanishes, to be succeeded in his rapt vision by the fairy whom he had saved in her transformed shape. She promises him the usual three wishes, and as she departs, he returns completely to himself. In the second movement, he obtains and wreaks vengeance on his enemies, and in the third he enjoys the splendid and the the placid delights of active and passive power. In the fourth he wins the fairy's love and dwells in delight with her for a while amid his ruins; but when his heart wanders and his affection wanes, the fire of her finer nature consumes him and he dies. This is a large scheme, and in its development it is by turns rhapsodical, passionate, mysterious, dramatic, picturesque and suggestive. Invention sweeps freely along its pages, bringing many original fancies which are set forth in an orchestral score which has remarkable effect and power in its combinations, is often really intense, and yet keeps well on the hither side of the bizarre or extravagant. With probably a similar fancy in mind to that which guided David to the reiteration of a single note as the key to his tone-picture of empty space, in "The Desert," Rimsky-Korsakoff clings almost constantly in the first movement to his diapason of F sharp, which vibrates impassively alike under the sombre chords and uncertain phrases of his introductory large and beneath the episodes which follow the appearance of the hunted gazelle. So and at later periods,—especially in the last movement—when the desert and the ruins and the solitude are to be felt as essential to the situation, that same deep, trembling tone makes it way below the cause of the current of action and sentiment. The bounding of the gazette, the circling of the monstrous bird, its downward swoop, the sharp lance stroke, the cry of fear and pain and discomfiture, the leaping away of the rescued creature, and the fluttering wings of the approaching fairy, are succinctly and significantly expressed, and the first movement rises to its simple climax so quickly and lightly, that at the rehearsal people simply stared one another in the face, doubtful whether that soft, full, high chord were the end. The subsequent movements are no less imaginative and artful. The harsh rush and crash of gratified revenge and the slower, heavier pulse of cold, deliberate menace; the swell and pomp of dominant power and the large suavity of assured control; the richness of mutnal emotion and the fading away of passion into nonentity at last—these are all so drawn and colored that who ever likes a musical poem of such kind might well be delighted. There is much nice skill in the treatment of individual instruments: the violas have some very well-thought and original passages; the bassoons are allowed to show their calmest and broadest tones; the harp contributes amply and entirely in character, and the many percussion instruments are carefully fitted to their places. There is nothing like a scherzo; after the slow opening, the first, second and third movements are all quick, and the last begins so, changing midway to an andante amoroso and a largo borrowed from the beginning. The work ends as it began, in a pianissimo.

The performance was superb in elasticity, color, lucidity and sympathy, and Mr. Paur again showed his command of the romantic as well as of the classic. The other selections were also admirably played, with a tremendous vigor for the bitter storms of the "Francesca da Rimini" and great versatility for the Wagner prelude.

Next week there will be played Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Mr. Loeffler's "Tintagiles," (its second hearing,) and the "Ride of the Walkyries." Mr. Ffrangcon Davies will sing twice.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 13, 1898.

Echoes from Yesterday's Symphony Concert.

Three of the four orchestral works played by the Boston symphony orchestra at the 18th concert were in Ercles' vein, the opening number, Mendelssohn's "Sea Calm" overture, alone being in the category of the more tranquil compositions. The novelty on the program was the "Antar" symphony, written by Rimsky-Korsakoff and performed here for the first time. The other selections were Tschaikowsky's fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini" and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Mendelssohn work retains all its charm, and although it was written about 60 years ago the orchestration is as elaborate and modern as many of the so-called "advanced" scores. To be sure there are but few of the newly discovered (?) instrumental combinations used, but the master's work is ever new and enchanting, and probably will be played and enjoyed when many of the more audacious compositions are practically forgotten. Mr Paur's men interpreted the overture in magnificent style, preserving all the harmonious delicacy and suggestiveness of the different tone pictures.

Another familiar number, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," was given with excellent effect, and the Tschaikowsky fantasia, with its gloomy and passionate outpourings, received the proper tempestuous treatment. With opera in German at the Boston theater and Russian compositions on the symphony program, the admirers of "music of the future" surely must have found satiety at the close of last week.

The Wagner number may be considered the least turbulent of the last three numbers of the symphony concert, for despite the fact that Tschaikowsky was even more vigorous than the prelude, the "Antar" symphony eclipsed them both in weird orchestration and unharmonic effects. It is strange, uncanny in truth, and combines such strange instrumentation, queer modulations and rapid changes in tempo and key that a single hearing leaves the auditor in doubt as to the value of the work. That it is tremendously difficult to play there is no question, and that the orchestra mastered those difficulties is equally plain, but there criticism at present must cease. The Russian composer, Korsakoff, evidently has evolved a musical enigma which is too complex of solution now.

Mr Ffrangcon Davies, basso, will be the soloist this week. The orchestral numbers will be as follows: Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, Charles Martin Loeffler's symphonic poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," for orchestra and two violes d'amour obbligate (the violes d'amour by Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr C. M. Loeffler); Richard Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries."

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 13.

Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The program was:

Overture "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" .... Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2—"Antar," op 15 ....
.... Romsky—Korsakoff
Fantasia- "Francesca da Romini" op 32
.... Tschaikovsky
Prelude- "Die Meistersinger" .... Wagner

The "Antar" symphony was given for the first time in Boston and it is possible that one would like it better if it did not suggest that one had heard it all before. It was worth hearing, all new music by authoritative composers is worth the hearing: but having heard this particular work there will not be much eagerness to hear it again. It is program music suggesting the majestic aspect of the Syrian desert and the ruins of Palmyra. Antar, "the jewel of the desert," braves the Spirits of Darkness, kills a gigantic bird that was pursuing "a lovely and bounding gazelle," the throwing of the javelin "cleverly suggested by a double-octave skip in the violins, violas and flutes," then Antar falls asleep, dreams that he is in the palace of the fairy Ghul-Nazar, who is the gazelle that he saved from the claws of the gigantic bird. The grateful fairy promises him "the three fruitions of life" and when he accepts the vision vanishes and he wakes up. The first gift is that of revenge, the second the delights of power, the third the delights of love, and in the end Antar's heart is burned up by the fire of the fairy's lips and he dies pianissimo in her arms. With these clews the music becomes radiant with meaning, when one can detect the difference between the gazelle and the roc, between the spirits of darkness and the ruins of Palmyra, and under the sway of the imagination one can note that the composer is occasionally charming, and forget that he is frequently trivial, and that at times it is difficult to tell if he is himself or Tschaikovsky. There are several very delightful moments in the work, but the padding far outbalances the inspiration. The ending of the symphony was a very pleasant surprise, for Antar died quietly and the tam-tams, kettle drums, cymbals, bass tubas and triangle were silent. The Tschaikovsky fantasia would have sounded better had it not immediately followed the symphony, although the arrangement gave the curious a chance to contrast the Tschaikovsky with the Rimsky-Korsakoff kiss.

The program for the next concert is Symphony, A. minor, No. 3, Mendelssohn; Symphonic Poem, "The Death of Tentagiles," Mr. Chas. M. Loeffler; a song solo, and the "Ride of the Walkyries," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. Ffrangeon Davies.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 14, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphony No. 2, "Antar," opus 15.
(First time in Boston.)
Tchaikovsky: Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32.
Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Saturday was a Russian day, in all conscience! Eight Russian numbers in the afternoon from Mr. Siloti, and two in the evening from our orchestra—with Siloti himself applauding for all he was worth from a seat on the floor of the hall!

It was a curious impression, hearing Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" after a silence of some years. We have always been warmly enthusiastic about this overture; if not quite up to the "Hebriden" or the "Midsummer Night's Dream," it is still a work of exquisite genius, full of picturesque poetry. It holds by no means the last place in the list of those concert overtures in which Mendelssohn found, upon the whole, his most original and congenial field. Before the concert, we expressed some of this to a member of the orchestra, and he warned us that we should be disappointed; that the work would no longer sound now as it used to in the days of yore. Well, he was right; we were disappointed—not in the overture itself, but in the effect it made. This effect was a curious one: the composition seemed as strong, beautiful and poetic as ever; only a change seemed to have come over ourselves—the music all sounded as if we had suddenly grown partially deaf, the whole edge of the thing seemed dulled. This experience, which is perfectly explicable, has not diminished our faith in Mendelssohn's overture in the least; we firmly believe that the "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" will continue to be played and enjoyed when people will ask you who and what sort of a man Tchaikovsky was, and what he wrote. We are fully pursuaded that the dull impression last Saturday evening came solely from contrasting Mendelssohn's orchestration, in a hall far too large for it, with recent hearings of more modern orchestration, in the same hall—which is just right for it.

And so we have at last heard Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Antar"! That it cannot compare with his "Scheherazade" in vigor of invention and force of fascination seems pretty clear. But one finds in it all the germs of what fascinates one so in the later and stronger work. There is the same brilliant imaginativeness, the same conspicuous power of producing a vivid picture, the same welcome conciseness, the same absolute originality in orchestration, the same power of holding a movement together, as a recognizable whole, by mysterious means apparently unknown to other composers. The musical material is, to be sure, far inferior, and the workmanship less masterly; but the "Scheherazade" shows none the less the logical fuller development of the man who wrote the "Antar." After hearing the one, you could spot the composer on hearing the other, without the help of a programme. What an astonishingly individual thing Rimsky-Korsakoff's orchestra is! How full of aroma and savor! Nobody else scores just as he does; even Liszt and Berlioz are not more individual in their coloring. Then he has a certain elegance which his stronger compatriot, Tchaikovsky, for the most part lacks. In feeling he is perhaps rather shallow and epidermal; his orchestral works that we have heard here hardly rise above the level of fascinating jeux d'esprit; they have a certain vers de société flavor. But they do not seem to aspire to much more; we cannot but find Rimsky-Korsakoff more satisfying in his peculiar fashion than we do Tchaikovsky on his higher plane. The performance of the "Antar" was admirable at every point.

Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" can hardly be justly placed upon the same level with his "Romeo and Juliet"; it shows both his strength and his weakness. As a Dantesque picture of hell, it is brilliantly vivid; perhaps no finer a realization of the picture painted in words by Dante than Gustave Doré's illustrations of the same subject, or Martin's of "Paradise Lost"; there is a certain wilful portentousness about it that is more striking than convincing. It would never keep you awake of nights. But vivid and brilliant it certainly is; nothing ever sounded more cavernous, more speluncal, than those brazen blasts at the beginning; the whirlwind business is all capital. Only the episode in the middle, from which the composition takes it name, strikes us as weak and inadequate. Here we have the same sort of theme that we find in the cantilena of the first movement of the "Pathetic" symphony; a melody positively dripping with emotion, but commonplace and intrinsically ignoble. It does not fit Francesca in the least,; or, if at all, only in a generally emotional way. Remember that Dante, like a true Olympian deity, wiped out Francesca from actual history and placed her amongst the stars; ever since the "Divina Commedia" she is to be thought of only with loving reverence, as one poetically canonized. Tchaikovsky was the last man in the world to reflect anything of the simple nobility of feeling expressed by Dante in this matchless episode. One can say of this Francesca of Tchaikovsky's, as was once said of Falguière's Diana, "There is no objection to M. Falguière's taking any beautifully formed unmentionable young person he pleases as a model for a nude statue; but, when he bestows upon the lifelike reproduction of this same unmentionable young person the name of the goddess of Chastity, you feel that it is very like an inartistic profanation." The performance of the fantasia was irreproachable, and more than that.

We have heard the "Meistersinger" prelude better played. What is the need of forcing the brass so in Wagner's instrumentation? It makes it sound coarse and vulgar, besides destroying the balance of the orchestra. And just here it occurs to us: may not the frequent hearing of this too strident sort of playing of Wagner's orchestral works, and of orchestral excerpts from his music-dramas, be at the bottom of the fault some people find with stage performances of his operas in which the orchestra is wisely kept under so as not to drown out the singers—that such performances are weak and un-Wagnerish?

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus. 56; C. M. Loeffler, symphonic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," for orchestra and two violes d'amour (the violes d'armour by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler); Wagner, "Der Ritt der Walküren." Mr. Ffrangçon Davies will sing two solos, to be announced later.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

Seventy-fifth year—Vol. LIII. Uo. 290

MONDAY, MAHCH 14, 1898.

First Boston Performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff Symphony "Antar"—A Fine Concert.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighteenth concert. The programme:

Overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage" ....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 2, "Antar," op. 15.... Rimsky-Korsakoff
(First time in Boston.)
Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini,".. Tschaikowsky
Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg" ....Wagner

The concert smelled of vodkha and left a taste of paprika hot in the mouth. So much of the Slav has not been collected in Music Hall for some time. On the whole, it was a trifle monotonous, and when came the mild and gentle Wagner, so clear to comprehend after the roar and tumult of the preceding Russians, there was a feeling of decided gratification. But think of Wagner sounding brightly, melodious and simple! It shows how the world has wagged since "Die Meistersinger."

The "Antar" symphony is not very much of a symphony, after all, at least according to the form we have come to accept. It is a tonal poem-picture, pure and simple, and never by any chance rises to symphonic dignity and grandeur. The bounding gazelle, the great bird, the hurling of the javelin, the dream of Antar, his revenge, power, love and death—all are pretty well depicted as such things go. There are moments of great beauty, and a plenty of rich and effective orchestration, but the total result is pointless and monotonous. It is well worth hearing, experimentally, and it was played with superb fire and brilliancy.

The "Francesca da Rimini" fantasia has been discussed in this department before. There only need be repeated a word of admiration for the marvellous reproduction on stringed instruments of those "cruellest winds" in hell's domain, and of praise for the extreme virtuosity of the players.

The lovely sea-piece of Mendelssohn might well have been placed at the end, in order to emphasize the occasional delights of delicate and beautiful writing. However, as I said before, the "Meistersinger" prelude served the purpose pretty well. Both were given with much splendor by the orchestra.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16, 1898.

THE program of the eighteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall was as follows:

Overture, Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage	Mendelssohn
Symphony, Antar (First time in Boston.)	Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, Francesca da Rimini	Tschaikowsky
Prelude to Die Meistersinger	Wagner

Ichabod! Ichabod!

Fifteen or sixteen years ago I began to burn with curiosity to hear music by Rimsky-Korsakoff. First of all the name exercised a spell.

> His name was a terrible name, indeed,
> Being Timothy Thady Mulligan;
> And whenever he emptied his tumbler of punch,
> He'd not rest till he filled it full again.

As the years went by I became acquainted little by little with works of the Neo-Russian school. I heard a symphony by Borodine; I was introduced to the music of Stcherbatscheff; Balakireff was something more than a name and at last I heard Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" and was in the seventh heaven of delight. His "Russian Easter" pleased me less. Then I thought, shall we ever hear "Antar" and "Sadko?" The first has been played in Bordeaux. Is it possible that Boston does not know it? It was performed in New York some time in the season of '91-'92 under Mr. Van der Stucken's beat. Why should Bostonians burst in ignorance?

"Antar." The name itself haunted me, whether it appeared as Antar, Antara or Antarah. Was he one of the seven that wrote "Al Moallacat," poems that were hung in turn on the door of the Kaabah, poems written by poets that flourished in the period called Al Giaheliat, or the Period of Ignorance? Or should Nabegah be substituted in the place of Antar?

Wild, yea marvelous, are the legends told of Antar. I do not care for Antar, the poet, and I am pleased to learn that the poetry ascribed to him is disputed and dubbed modern. Listen to these extracts:

"Mercy, my lord, is the noblest quality of the noble."

"Bear not malice, O Shibub, for of malice good never came."

An Arabian Tupper!

But this is more like it: "She is blooming as the sun at dawn, with hair black as the midnight shades, with Paradise in her eye, her bosom an enchantment, and a form waving like he tamarisk when the soft wind blows from the hills of Nijd."

* * *

Then the preface on a fly leaf of the orchestral score set me dreaming—for I saw the score long before I heard the music. I give it in Mr. Apthorp's version, and I make no apology for the quotation—Antar is not given every Saturday night.

ANTAR.

Majestic is the aspect of the Syrian Desert, majestic are the ruins of Palmyra, that city built by the Spirits of Darkness; but Antar, the jewel of the desert, braves them, and bears himself proudly amid the remains of the demolished city. Antar has quit the fellowship of men forever, he has sworn everlasting hatred against them for the evil with which they repaid the good he wished them. * * *

Suddenly a lovely and bounding gazelle appears; Antar makes ready to pursue it, but a noise seems to sound through the air, and the light of day is veiled behind a thick shade; a gigantic bird is chasing the gazelle. Antar immediately changes his mind; his lance strikes the monster and it flys away, uttering a piercing scream. The gazelle vanishes also. Antar, left alone in the midst of the ruins, soon falls asleep, thinking on what has happened.

He sees himself transported into a splendid palace, where a multitude of slaves hasten to wait upon him and charm him with their singing. It is the dwelling of the queen of Palmyra—the fairy Ghul Nazar. The gazelle he had saved from the talons of the Spirit of Darkness was none other than the fairy herself. The grateful Ghul-Nazar promises Antar the three great fruitions of life; and, when he decides to accept the gift, the vision vanishes and he awakes amid the ruins.

II.

The first fruition granted Antar by the Queen of Palmyra—is the delights of revenge.

III.

The second fruition—the delights of power.

IV.

Antar has returned to the ruins of Palmyra. The third fruition granted Antar by the fairy—is the delights of love. Antar beseeches the fairy to take away his life as soon as she perceives the least coldness on his part, and she promises to fulfill his wish.

When, after long and mutual happiness, the fairy sees one fine day that Antar is absent-minded and turns his gaze upon the distant horizon, she forthwith guesses the reason thereof. Then she kisses him passionately. The fire of her passion is communicated to Antar and burns up his heart.

Their lips unite in a last embrace, and Antar dies in the fairy's arms.

* * *

Antar, the jewel of the desert, bearing himself proudly amid the remains of the demolished city!

And that opening sentence: "Majestic is the aspect of the Syrian Desert," &c.

It reminds one of Poe's "The region of which I speak is a dreary region in Libya, by the borders of the River Zäire."

(Who was it, by the way, that objected to Milton's swollen sentences of geographical interest? Was it Landor?)

There are sentences that, as I have written you before, at once suggest mighty music, music which surpasses all music written. The first verse of the fifth chapter of Daniel is a fine example. Schumann's ballad of Belshazzar is commonplace and dreary in comparison.

And I thought of music by this Russian that would enlarge the majesty of the Syrian Desert and Palmyra or soothe for a moment the breasts of the Spirits of Darkness.

But Antar to me was only a printed score.

In Alfred Habets' "Alexandre Borodine" (Paris, 1893), I learned not only that Rimsky-Korsakoff about 1862 left St. Petersburg to visit North America as an officer of the Marine Service of Russia, but I also learned some interesting facts about Antar.

Borodine says: "Whereas, I began with the ancients, Korsakoff began with Glinka, Liszt and Berlioz. Saturated with their ideas, he entered into an unknown sphere.

I have read somewhere—probably in a series of articles on Russian composers, published in the spring of 1886, in The Theatre, edited by Deshler Welch—that "Antar" was first given in St. Petersburg in 1868, and that the critics did not like it. It was afterward performed at Magdeburg in June, 1881, at a concert of the Tonkünstlerversammlung. Borodine was there at the time.

In a letter from Magdeburg to César Cui, Borodine wrote as follows:

"Apropos of 'Antar,' Liszt told me that the orchestra at the first rehearsals found several passages hazy, but afterward becoming better acquainted with the work, they had seized the spirit of this masterly orchestration, appreciated its worth, and played with a lively interest. 'You know,' he added, 'that we Germans understand music with difficulty and not immediately. For this reason it is necessary to perform works like "Antar" as well as possible.' * * * I was obliged to go to a rehearsal to give to the conductor, Mr. Nikisch, some information concerning the performance of 'Antar'—about the cadenza for harp, the manner in which Oriental themes should be played by the wind instruments, &c. * * * The orchestra heard my remarks with most kindly and respectful attention."

Nikisch was half an hour late at this rehearsal. At last he raised his baton. For a long time he remained as petrified in this cataleptic attitude; then he moved the stick brusquely and went ahead."

Nothing more about "Antar." The letter was left unfinished.

And I had not yet heard "Antar."

Last year I was reading in Von Bülow's "Ausgewählte Schriften" a letter written by him from London November 27, 1878, to the Signale. In it he speaks of "Rimsky-Korsakoff, of St. Petersburg, whose program symphony in four movements, 'Antar,' a magnificent tone picture, announces a coming tone poet. Perhaps you would like to know what I mean by this phrase? A tone poet is first of all a romantic, who if he develops himself into a genius can also be a classic—Chopin for instance. Among the younger tone poets I reckon Grieg and Hans von Bronsart."

* * *

Last month I read reviews of a performance of "Antar" in Paris at a Lamoureux concert. Mr. Barbadette said in Le Menestrel that the first movement might represent the danse du ventre as well as Palmyra and the gazelle and the bird. He sums up the matter thus: "Poor Antor could not resist so many delights; he dies from them, and harp strains show that he has ascended to some paradise or other, and that the symphony is over." He speaks of "les vagues mélopees" of the composer.

Ernst Thomas, reviewing the same concert for Le Guide Musical (Brussels), took a more cheerful view. "The work opens with an admirable picture of the desert, tonally warm and full of color, and of a great intensity of expression. There is perhaps too much affectation in this rude, clamorous savage orchestration that proposes to symbolize Vengeance, and the orchestra is often uselessly employed. The march, which answers the idea of Power, is imposing, majestic and well contrived. In Love the composer has found phrases full of tenderness and grace; too languorous, however, and destitute of force and passion. The symphony, as a whole, is most interesting; and if the composer does not always develop his themes as much as would be desirable, he often charms the hearer by the variety and the originality of his rhythms and by unexpected harmonic progressions."

* * *

Well, last night I heard "Antar." The disappointment was keen. The tone painting of the desert did not seem comparable to that in Goldmark's "Queen of Sheba" or David's "Desert" or the little orchestral sketch by Borodine. The Palmyra might be the town in New York State, quiet and commonplace. The approach of the gazelle and the whole business of the bird are cleverly managed—of course you must be told by the printed word what is about to happen, otherwise you might make a sad mistake in confounding emotions—but there must be something more than cleverness in music. The march seemed more effective than the movement designed to portray vengeance. I am ashamed to say that the love music of the last movement as a whole bored me. Perhaps I was not in the mood. And remember that for three weeks I had listened to orchestral passion as aroused by Walter Damrosch—with both arms.

There is ingenious and daring experimenting in "Antar;" there are instances of exquisite color; there are striking rhythms. I do not find in it much true musical thought or many authoritative statements. I do not find the composer taking the matter so seriously that you are forced to respect him and to think, "I am probably wrong; I must hear this piece again; there must be something in it." I weary of the constant tossing about of a theme; now one instrument has it, and now it is the turn of another; and there is little or no genuine development; hence the feeling of monotony, of endless and futile repetition. Antar is not to be named in the same breath with Scheherazade. The latter is planned and carried out in such a masterly fashion that you are persuaded during the performance that the Oriental scales and harmonic feeling are orthodox, and that our classics are, after all, the unbelievers.

* * *

Mr. Siloti and I were discussing Antar last night after the concert. I broached the subject with diffidence, because he is a good Russian and in sympathy with the ultramodern school. "No," he said; "Antar is interesting historically, and there are fine things in it; after all it is not music, and it should not be taken from the shelf."

* * *

Think of it! Antar immediately after Mendelssohn's smug overture! I wonder whether Mr. Paur really likes the "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." A street car ride from Music Hall to his home in Jamaica Plain is far more exciting, for there are breweries on the way.

When I hear this overture—and I hope that I shall never be obliged to hear it, "Ruy Blas," or the "Dedication of the House," by Bethoven, again—I think of a wheezing steamboat laden with happy Sunday-school children and picnic baskets, leaving the wharf in Atlantic avenue for Hull. "What's that, teacher?" "That's a fort, dear." "Are there any real cannons there?" "I don't know, dear; we'll find out when the Spaniards come."

* * *

Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" was superbly played. Yet Madonna Francesca, whose mouth, all quivering, was kissed by Polo, is not the feature of this fantaisia. Hell's Whirlwind is the subject of Tschaikowsky's story: "Cruelest winds under a dark and gloomy air." Is there anything in the literature of the orchestra so tremendously real as this whirlwind imagined by the Russian after seeing Doré's drawings to the "Inferno?"

> To be imprisoned in the viewless winds
> And blown with restless violence round about
> The pendent world.

And yet I am not sure that such a noisy whirlwind would be the worst of hells. Do you recall Friar Bonaventura's speech to Annabella in John Ford's play:

> There is a place—
> List, daughter!—in a black and hollow vault,
> Where day is never seen; there shines no sun,
> But flaming horror of consuming fires,
> A lightless sulphur, choked with smoky fogs
> Of an infected darkness: in this place
> Dwell many thousand thousand sundry sort
> Of never-dying deaths. * * *
> There stand these wretched things
> Who have dreamed out whole years in lawless sheets
> And secret incests, cursing one another.

* * *

Then there is the speech of Walter to the girl in Alexander Smith's "Life Drama":

> A thousand years hence, when we both are damned,
> We'll sit like ghosts upon the wailing shore,
> And read our lives by the red light of hell.

* * *

The last concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn this season will be given at the Academy of Music Friday afternoon, March 25, and Saturday evening, March 26. Ffrangcon-Davies, baritone, will be the soloist. The program will be as follows:

Symphony in D major	Haydn
Templar's Soliloquy, from Ivanhoe	Sullivan
Overture to The Merry Wives of Windsor	Nicolai
Entr'acte from Manfred	Reinecke
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saëns
Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm, from Die Walkyrie,	Wagner
Overture to Mignon	A. Thomas

The Saturday night concert will be devoted to Beethoven and Wagner.

Three movements from the Ninth Symphony, in D minor, op. 125—Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso; Molto vivace, presto; adagio molto e cantabile,	Ludwig van Beethoven
Rienzi, overture	Wagner
Siegfried. Idyll	Wagner
Lohengrin, prelude Act III	Wagner
Tristan and Isolde, prelude and Isolde's Love Death,	Wagner
Die Walküre, Ride of the Valkyries, Act III	Wagner

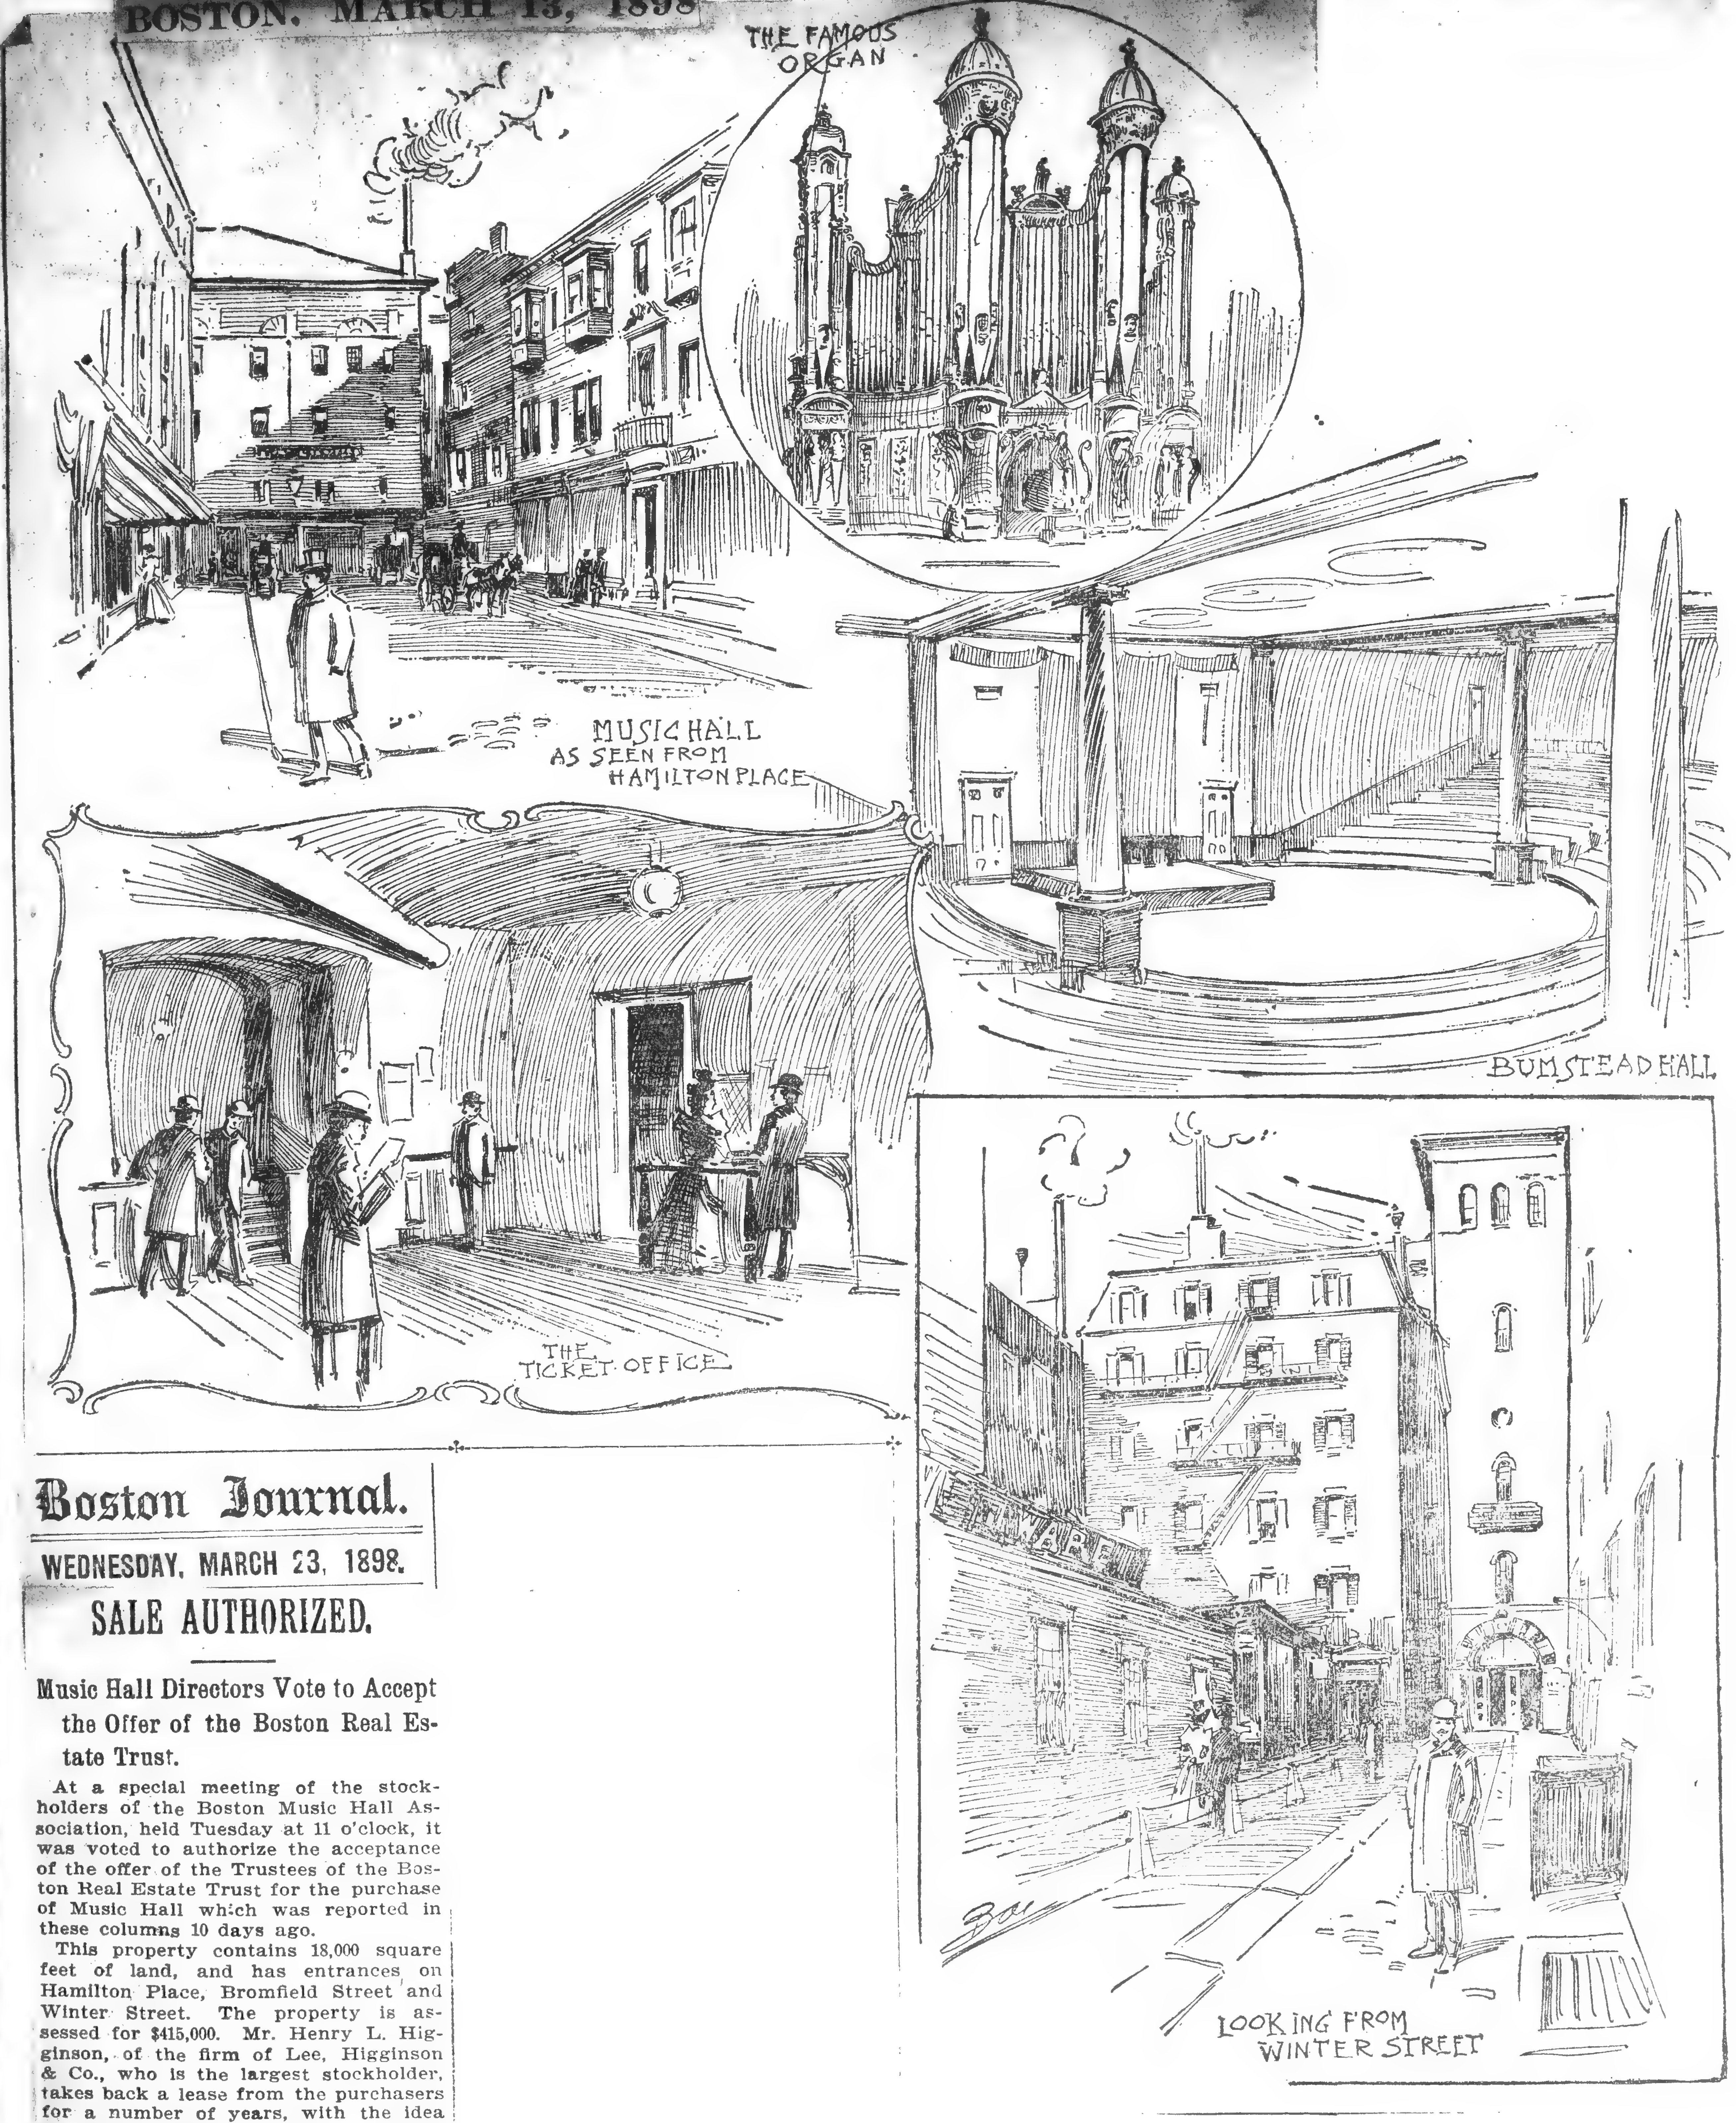
EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

BROOKLYN LIFE

VOL. XVI. BROOKLYN, N. Y., MAR. 19, 1898. No. 420.

NEXT week will bring to a close the two series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Academy of Music. For the Friday afternoon concert Francon Davies, the popular baritone, has been engaged as soloist, his numbers being the "Templar's Soliloquy," from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," and the beautiful closing scene of "Die Walkuere." The orchestra will play the familiar overtures to "Mignon" and "The Merry Wives of Windsor," the Haydn symphony in D minor, the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens and an entr'acte from Reinecke's "Manfred." Saturday night the program will open with three movements from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The rest of the evening will be devoted to Wagner, and, contrary to the usual rule, there will be no soloists. The Wagner numbers are the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried Idyll," the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde" and "The Ride of the Walkyries," from "Die Walkuere." An explanatory lecture by Mr. Krehbiel—illustrated by Miss Mills—will precede the lecture on Thursday.

THE SUNDAY HERALD - BOSTON, MARCH 13, 1898



THE FAMOUS ORGAN
MUSIC HALL AS SEEN FROM HAMILTON PLACE
BUMSTEAD HALL
THE TICKET OFFICE
LOOKING FROM WINTER STREET

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1898.

SALE AUTHORIZED.

Music Hall Directors Vote to Accept the Offer of the Boston Real Estate Trust.

At a special meeting of the stockholders of the Boston Music Hall Association, held Tuesday at 11 o'clock, it was voted to authorize the acceptance of the offer of the Trustees of the Boston Real Estate Trust for the purchase of Music Hall which was reported in these columns 10 days ago.

This property contains 18,000 square feet of land, and has entrances on Hamilton Place, Bromfield Street and Winter Street. The property is assessed for $415,000. Mr. Henry L. Higginson, of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., who is the largest stockholder, takes back a lease from the purchasers for a number of years, with the idea of having Symphony concerts held in the hall for the present. The sale was made by C. W. Whittier.

THE SUNDAY [illegible] [illegible]ON. M[illegible] 13, 1898

OLD HALL'S HISTORY.

Scenes Enacted in Boston's Temple of Music.

Programme of the Great Opening Festival.

Some of the Song Birds Who Have Sung There.

Preachers and Lecturers on Its Platform.

Starting the Fund for the Famous Old Organ.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL is to be sold and probably demolished in a year or two. If the average Bostonian were asked what was the most familiar building to him in Boston, he would say it was Music Hall.

While the building is hardly old enough to warrant its being called a landmark, it has seen more history than any other structure in the "Athens of America," with the one exception, that of Faneuil Hall. Nearly every great event in the last 45 years has had Music Hall for a setting, since Faneuil Hall has long been outgrown by the needs of a great city.

Last November, on the 20th day of the month, Music Hall was 45 years old. The hall was opened on Saturday night, Nov. 20, 1852, with a grand concert.

The Boston Herald of Nov. 20, 1852, a little four-page paper, selling for 1 cent, printed an advance notice on the opening of the hall, and said, among other things:

"The programme is full and rich. No doubt this Festival, a proud one for Boston, will be the grandest event that was ever celebrated in this city." The notice is only 14 lines long, and the account in the following Monday's paper, there being no Sunday paper, was a scant half column in length, a report that would make a modern city editor laugh.

A part of the report of the opening is as follows:

"The new Music Hall was opened on Saturday evening for the first time, to an immense audience, assembled to participate in the great musical festival that had been prepared for the opening night. The hall exceeds the expectations of every one who has seen it. It is a grand and sumptuous affair. We have had nothing like it in Boston, and it may be long before we shall have another hall of equal extent, magnificence and beauty.

"The festival concert was in every respect a triumphant one, and gave unbounded satisfaction to as large and as fashionable an audience as was ever gathered within the walls of a concert hall. The choruses by the Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies were very effective, and the grand 'Hallelujah chorus' swelled through the spacious hall in uninterrupted grandeur. Albani appeared to the greatest advantage. Her voice filled the hall completely, and she gave unmingled satisfaction and delight. Mr. Arthurson and Sangiovanni were apologized for, on the ground of indisposition, and their absence caused some change in the programme."

The programme printed for the opening festival was as follows:

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

The Directors of the Boston Music Hall have much pleasure in announcing to the public that their building will be finished, and opened with a

MUSICAL FESTIVAL,
ON SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1852.

It is proposed that the proceeds of the Concert, after deducting expenses, shall be applied to form a fund, which at some future day may enable them to furnish the hall with an organ of the first class.

On this occasion they will have the valuable assistance of the following musical societies of Boston, who have all generously offered their aid:

The Handel and Haydn Society.
The Musical Education Society.
The Musical Fund Society.
The Germania Serenade Band.
The German Liederkranz.

The directors have also secured the services of

Madame Marietta Alboni,
Signor Sangiovanni,
Signor Rovere, and
Signor Arditi.

Director of the Musical Fund Society......
Organist....................Mr. August Fries
Conductor....................Mr. F. F. Mueller
Mr. George J. Webb

The price of tickets to all parts of the house has been fixed at

TWO DOLLARS.

Doors open at 6½ o'clock—concert to commence at 7½.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1. Overture, "Zauberfloete"..........Mozart
Musical Fund Society.
2. Chorus—Hallelujah, from "Mount of Olives"..........Beethoven
Handel and Haydn Society.
3. Song—"Casta Diva"..........Bellini
Madame Alboni.
4. German Part-songs.
"Nachlied"..........Lenz
"Der Jaeger Abschied"....Mendelssohn
Kreissman's German Liederkranz.
5. Polonaise Concertante..........
"Gruss an das Vaterland"
Composed for orchestra by Wittmann.
Arranged for brass music by G. Schnapp.
Germania Serenade Band.
6. Canzone—Ciascun la dice from "La Fille du Regiment"..........Donizetti
Madame Alboni.
7. Chorus—"The Heavens Are Telling," from the "Creation"..........Haydn
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

PART II.

8. Overture—"Oberon"..........Weber
Musical Fund Society.
9. Selection from the oratorio of "St. Paul"..........Mendelssohn
Mr. Arthurson.
Musical Education Society.
10. Trio—"Ah quel colpa," from "Il Barbiere"..........Rossini
Mme. Alboni, Sig. Sangiovanni and Sig. Rovere.
11. Andante from fifth symphony....Beethoven
Musical Fund Society.
12. Rondo Finale—"Non piu mesta," from "Cenerentola"..........Rossini
Madame Alboni.
13. Hallelujah Chorus, from the "Messiah"
Handel
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

The Herald of Nov. 22, 1852, the Monday after the opening of the hall, goes on to say:

"Yesterday forenoon the Rev. Theodore Parker preached his first sermon in the hall. Every seat on the floor, in the galleries and the orchestra was occupied."

Then, after telling what Mr. Parker preached about, it says:

"Mr. Parker will preach at the Music Hall on Thanksgiving forenoon. The society under his charge have engaged it for a regular place of worship."

On the night before this report was printed, Sunday, Mme. Sontag, who had already announced her farewell concert, in the style of Patti, some days before, gave a "positively farewell concert" in Music Hall. She gave another farewell on the next Tuesday evening. On Saturday evening, the 27th, the Germania Musical Society gave its first subscription concert. Mme. Albani gave her farewell concert on the evening of the 26th. The Germania course of concerts lasted all that winter, with public rehearsals every Wednesday afternoon.

This hall was for many years unsurpassed for musical purposes by any other hall in the country. The intention was to erect a hall for great concerts of vocal and orchestral music, as perfect in its acoustic qualities as modern theory could make it.

A short description of the hall will hardly be out of place at this time. Its dimensions are 130 feet in length, 78 in width and 65 in height. Among the decorations are a cast of the Belvidere Apollo, presented by Charlotte Cushman, which fills a niche at one end of the hall. At the opposite end is the bronze statue of Beethoven, by Crawford, the gift of Charles C. Perkins. The seating capacity is about 2600. Bumstead Hall, under Music Hall, seats about 800, and is in the shape of the Agora at Athens. It has been used mainly for rehearsals, meetings of the Handel and Haydn Society and billiard matches.

The great organ, which was the pride of Boston for 20 years, was "inaugurated" on the night of Saturday, Nov. 2, 1863. The movement to buy an organ for Music Hall began when the hall was opened, for the proceeds of the first concert, Nov. 20, 1852, were set aside as a starter for an organ fund. The instrument was built by Herr E. F. Walcker of Ludwigsburg, Wurtemberg, who also built the cathedral organ at Ulm. It contained 5474 pipes, of which 690 were in the pedal organ and 84 registers. It had all the improvements known at the time of its building.

The organ was first heard by the public on the night of Nov. 2, 1863. There was a great celebration in honor of the event. Charlotte Cushman read an ode to the organ, written for the occasion. John K. Paine struck the public note on the organ, playing selections from Bach. Mr. Paine was organist of the Old West Church and musical instructor at Harvard. Herr Friedrich Walcker, son of the builder, officially opened the organ. W. Eugene Thayer of Worcester played a fugue in C minor from Bach, who seemed to be the favorite of the night. George W. Morgan, organist of Grace Church, New York, played from Handel's "Israel in Egypt." B. J. Lang, organist of the Old South Church, played a sonata of Mendelssohn, the words of which were sung by the Handel and Haydn Society. Dr. S. P. Tuckerman, organist of St. Paul's, played church music from Palestrina and an anthem of Purcell. The "Hallelujah Chorus" of Handel was played by George W. Morgan. The money went to a fund to keep the instrument in repair, and other concerts for the same purpose were held every few nights for a long time. These "organ fund concerts" were kept up for a number of years.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave a grand choral inauguration of the organ on the night of Nov. 28, 1863, to help pay the organ debt, for it was not bought for cash. Among the selections were the "Hallelujah Chorus," Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," Martin Luther's choral, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," arranged by Otto Nicolai, and, as a second half of the programme, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang." The concert was repeated by request soon after, with Carl Zerrahn as director.

The "Messiah" was given for the first time with the new organ by the Handel and Hayden Society on Dec. 27 of that year. The Orchestral Union started on its 10th season, with the new organ, Jan. 13, 1864.

A great event was the celebration of the 300 years that had passed since the birth of Shakespeare, on April 23, 1864. A number of singers, well known in their time, took part. Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus" and the "First Walpurgis Night," words by Goethe and music by Mendelssohn, were given.

On May 26 next, the American Tract Society celebrated its 50th year mark, Henry Ward Beecher being one of the speakers.

The next event of interest was on June 8 of the same year, when Admiral Lessoffsky and the officers of the Russian fleet were honored with a musical festival, in which the public school children took part.

On April 16, 1865, a grand choral performance marked the close of the civil war, being given in honor of the great victories. The Handel and Haydn sang "Israel in Egypt," the "Messiah" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

A solemn occasion was the memorial service for the martyred President, on the afternoon of June 1, 1865, under the direction of the municipal authorities. Mayor Lincoln presided. The Handel and Haydn Society sang a dirge from "Judas Maccabaeus." The eulogy was made by Charles Sumner. A choral was sung, "Luther's Judgment Hymn," with English words by Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The next July 4 was a gala occasion, for the celebration of the 89th year of independence was also one of the close of the war. An original hymn was read by Julia Ward Howe.

The first symphony concert was given on Dec. 28, 1865, by the Harvard Musical Association, the forerunner of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Carl Zerrahn was director. A course of six concerts was begun.

Among the singers of the day who were heard from the great stage were Clara Louise Kellogg, Annie Louise Cary, Adelaide Phillips, Mlle. Parepa, Mrs. J. B. Cary and Matilda Phillips. Jenny Lind was another, and Christine Nilsson also. Among the popular entertainments were the Mercantile Library course, the Bay State course, the Redpath lectures and the Bateman concerts.

The dead war Governor, John A. Andrew, was honored with a great memorial service on Nov. 26, 1867. Edwin P. Whipple made the eulogy, Julia Ward Howe read a poem, and James Freeman Clarke offered prayer.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave its first three-year May festival in the spring of 1868, with "Samson," "St. Paul," Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," the last for the first time in this country, the "Messiah" and the "Creation."

Clara Louise Kellogg gave concerts and Mrs. Scott Siddons readings soon after, and John B. Gough lectured on total abstinence. The New England Conservatory also began to give concerts, and Theodore Thomas made his appearance with his great orchestra from New York.

The Rev. W. H. H. Murray began his sermons in Music Hall on June 20, 1875, under the auspices of De Molay commandery. The first regular services of Mr. Murray's new church were held on Oct. 3, 1875, and the church went out of existence on June 2, 1878, as near as the records of the hall show.

P. T. Barnum lectured on "The World and How to Live in It," Hans von Buelow gave recitals and Minot Savage lectured.

On March 17, 1876, the 100th anniversary of the evacuation of Boston was celebrated, the oration being made by George E. Ellis, D. D. The next Fourth of July Robert C. Winthrop made the oration, and Brooks Adams read the Declaration.

A great occasion was the testimonial to Ole Bull, who had married the sister of Longfellow, on Dec. 8, 1876. A number of the gentlemen who took part were Alexander H. Rice, James T. Fields, Henry W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, William Gaston, John D. Runkle, William B. Rogers, R. H. Dana, Jr., Oliver Ditson, Edward Everett Hale, Marshall P. Wilder and Alpheus Hardy.

The "Old South fund," to buy the Old South Church for a museum, was aided by a grand ball on Feb. 18, 1879. A memorial service to Gen. Joseph Hooker was held on Nov. 16 of the same year.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was founded in 1881, judging from the records, and played in Music Hall in its second season, and thence ever after. George Henschel was the director then. The Cecelia sang in 1877. The New England Conservatory gave its 1000th concert on May 17, 1882, the concerts beginning in 1867. On Nov. 1, 1882, Christine Nilsson made her first appearance in this country at Music Hall, under the management of Henry E. Abbey. This brings us down to recent history.

The great organ was taken out in 1884, on account of its crowding the Symphony orchestra too much, and the great sounding board was put in soon after. Dr. Tourgee had the organ stored in a shed behind the Conservatory, in hopes that the city would let him have part of the Old South burying ground for a concert hall for the organ. The city declined, however. The organ was sold last spring to Edwin F. Searles of Methuen for $1500. It cost $60,000.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1898

MUSIC HALL OR OPERA HOUSE?

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The sale of the Boston Music Hall property brings the question of what shall be done with the property of the "New Boston Music Hall Association" into unexpected prominence, and I trust that you will, as usual, give the use of the needed space in your columns for a discussion of the action to be taken in this matter.

Although not a stockholder in the corporation, circumstances made it possible at the time of the subscription to be of material assistance in arousing public interest in the movement, and my professional duties at that time compelled me to thoroughly acquaint myself with the whole subject, and to make a study of public auditoriums both abroad and at home. I had interviews with many of the best architects of Boston and New York, and obtained opinions from many lovers of music who have enjoyed opportunities of hearing concerts and other musical performances in every big city on both sides of the Atlantic.

The object of my inquiries at that time was to get information and not to prove the correctness of any given theory, and I now ask the liberty of opening up a discussion of the action to be taken by the "New Boston Music Hall Association," in order that the greatest musical good for the greatest possible number of the musical public may result from such action.

Allow me to preface my remarks upon the main subject by a protest against the criticisms made upon the location selected in the purchase of the land at the junction of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. If those who complain of this location will take a map of the section of the city south and west of Boston Common and find an estate or estates upon which a place of amusement arranged to seat over eight hundred people can be built upon, in compliance with the present building laws, which can be bought at a price that will make its use for such a purpose practicable, and is nearer Boston Common than the land now owned by the "New Music Hall Association," then I will admit the reasonableness of their objection. Real estate experts have failed in their endeavors to do this.

Now regarding the use of the property. If the purpose contemplated when the new corporation was formed, the building of a music hall, is carried out, the coming musical generation in this city will be deprived of much that it should enjoy, and the education of the Boston public in musical matters will take on limitations that will make the city more and more provincial in this characteristic. A new Music Hall may possibly supply an ideal home for the Symphony concerts, but the desirability of continuing to sacrifice every other line of musical development in the life of this city for the sake of maintaining these concerts is, I am rejoiced to say, becoming more and more realized among those who have studied the tendency of this yearly extravagance in the support of the Symphonies.

The money subscribed by the 290 or more stockholders to the "New Music Hall Association" was not raised specifically for a "music hall," but to provide a home for the Symphony Orchestra; and whatever plans may have been in the minds of the three trustees to whom the money was paid, it was at least an open question with the subscribers whether a music hall or an opera house was to be built. The money was raised from musical enthusiasts and for the interests of music.

In considering how this property can be used to best benefit the cause of music it may be well to recall the situation when the present Music Hall was built. Then the appeal for subscriptions was based upon the highest ideals, and the completion of the hall was looked upon as a step upward and onward in the development of the musical life of Boston. Let me ask those who accept what is as what should be if in their opinion the appeal for subscriptions to build the present Music Hall would have been successful if its uses in these later years had ever been dreamed of. Yet it is now contemplated to turn over the property of the "New Music Hall Association and the building of another Music Hall to the present officers of the new association, who are the identical men who have sanctioned the use of the present Music Hall for prize fights, cake walks, cat and dog shows, all-night dancing parties and other uses equally objectionable and equally at odds with all ideas of propriety and good taste. I have no personal antagonism toward Messrs. Henry L. Higginson and Charles E. Cotting, but I ask in all seriousness, has the management of Music Hall in recent years been such as to warrant a belief that these two gentlemen, who are alone responsible for the uses to which Music Hall has been put in recent years, will maintain any higher standing for a new hall of which they may be given control.

I have taken pains to fortify my own opinions regarding the possibilities of developing the New Music Hall property, and I have yet, with a single exception, to find any opposition among the company's stockholders to a reorganization of the company so as to allow of the building of not only a "home for the Symphony Orchestra" but a home also for operatic performances and for buildings suited to schools and instruction rooms for all lines of musical education. If the property is placed in the hands of men and women having a knowledge of and interest in the largest welfare of the musical public, it can be so used as to give this city a new start in its musical life and present possibilities for its thousands of musical students that have been demanded for many years by those open to conviction regarding such matters.

A well-appointed opera house, the use of which should be exclusively restricted to musical performances, could easily be arranged to give the best possible results in orchestral concerts, and the future patrons of the Symphonies could enjoy their weekly musical devotions with surroundings somewhat more in harmony with these performances than those provided in the present Music Hall. The classic lines of Mr. Higginson's woodshed roof would of course be missed, and the dull, dark and dismal decoration planned for the old auditorium by Mr. Cotting could not be enjoyed, but, with due fortitude, these deprivations could be borne.

It is difficult to fully state the advantages to the city which would result from the possession of such an opera house and buildings, under the control of directors having the same interest in music as has been so loyally shown by those who have directed the development of the Art Museum and Public Library in this city. It would, first of all, secure a permanent opera company with the yearly production of standard operas and the occasional bringing out of the works of native musicians which are now piled up and packed away every year by the discouraged applicants for a hearing from managers having interests other than the musical development of Boston. It would open up a field for American singers in reputable productions, now seldom supplied in America. It would give the students of orchestral instruments a possible opening other than those of the theatre orchestra and ballroom. It would complete the scheme of instruction now so admirably supplied otherwise by the New England Conservatory of Music, and put Boston, as she should be, in the advance in all that goes to supply a liberal musical education.

I do not wish to be understood as advising a repetition of the National Opera scheme, for I opposed the extravagance of Mrs. Thurber and Messrs. Theodore Thomas and Charles E. Locke in that undertaking from the start. I desire an opéra populaire," as it might be called. An opera house and company within the limits of moderation, to produce the line of operas within the repertoire of the Opéra Comique of Paris, leaving the grander works to the more liberal New York public, which includes a different element from what is found in this city.

It will not be found necessary to call upon musical Europe to maintain such an organization. America has an ample supply of singers and musicians, and the establishment of a permanent opera scheme here would make Boston a Mecca for hundreds of good American artists now engaged abroad, where they have had to be satisfied with fame in place of anticipated fortune.

Regarding the financial side of this matter, I will only say that if the property under consideration is given in charge of men and women who will show the same devotion to music as others in the city have recently shown in the cause of religion, there will be found no need of calling upon the subscribers to the stock of the "New Music Hall Association" for another cent.

FRED P. BACON.

Boston, March 14.

THE SUNDAY HERALD — BOSTON, MARCH 13, 1898

OLD HALL'S HISTORY.

Scenes Enacted in Boston's Temple of Music.

Programme of the Great Opening Festival.

Some of the Song Birds Who Have Sung There.

Preachers and Lecturers on Its Platform.

Starting the Fund for the Famous Old Organ.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL is to be sold and probably demolished in a year or two. If the average Bostonian were asked what was the most familiar building to him in Boston, he would say it was Music Hall.

While the building is hardly old enough to warrant its being called a landmark, it has seen more history than any other structure in the "Athens of America," with the one exception, that of Faneuil Hall. Nearly every great event in the last 45 years has had Music Hall for a setting, since Faneuil Hall has long been outgrown by the needs of a great city.

Last November, on the 20th day of the month, Music Hall was 45 years old. The hall was opened on Saturday night, Nov. 20, 1852, with a grand concert.

The Boston Herald of Nov. 20, 1852, a little four-page paper, selling for 1 cent, printed an advance notice on the opening of the hall, and said, among other things:

"The programme is full and rich. No doubt this Festival, a proud one for Boston, will be the grandest event that was ever celebrated in this city." The notice is only 14 lines long, and the account in the following Monday's paper, there being no Sunday paper, was a scant half column in length, a report that would make a modern city editor laugh.

A part of the report of the opening is as follows:

"The new Music Hall was opened on Saturday evening for the first time, to an immense audience, assembled to participate in the great musical festival that had been prepared for the opening night. The hall exceeds the expectations of every one who has seen it. It is a grand and sumptuous affair. We have had nothing like it in Boston, and it may be long before we shall have another hall of equal extent, magnificence and beauty.

"The festival concert was in every respect a triumphant one, and gave unbounded satisfaction to as large and as fashionable an audience as was ever gathered within the walls of a concert hall. The choruses by the Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies were very effective, and the grand 'Hallelujah chorus' swelled through the spacious hall in uninterrupted grandeur. Albani appeared to the greatest advantage. Her voice filled the hall completely, and she gave unmingled satisfaction and delight. Mr. Arthurson and Sangiovanni were apologized for, on the ground of indisposition, and their absence caused some change in the programme."

The programme printed for the opening festival was as follows:

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

The Directors of the Boston Music Hall have much pleasure in announcing to the public that their building will be finished, and opened with a

MUSICAL FESTIVAL,
ON SATURDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1852.

It is proposed that the proceeds of the Concert, after deducting expenses, shall be applied to form a fund, which at some future day may enable them to furnish the hall with an organ of the first class.

On this occasion they will have the valuable assistance of the following musical societies of Boston, who have all generously offered their aid:

The Handel and Haydn Society.
The Musical Education Society.
The Musical Fund Society.
The Germania Serenade Band.
The German Liederkranz.

The directors have also secured the services of

Madame Marietta Alboni,
Signor Sangiovanni,
Signor Rovere, and
Signor Arditi.

Director of the Musical Fund Society......
Organist....................Mr. August Fries
Conductor...............Mr. F. F. Mueller
..............Mr. George J. Webb

The price of tickets to all parts of the house has been fixed at

TWO DOLLARS.

Doors open at 6½ o'clock—concert to commence at 7½.

PROGRAMME.

PART I.

1. Overture, "Zauberfloete"..........Mozart
Musical Fund Society.
2. Chorus—Hallelujah, from "Mount of Olives"........................Beethoven
Handel and Haydn Society.
3. Song—"Casta Diva"................Bellini
Madame Alboni.
4. German Part-songs.
"Nachlied" ....Lenz
"Der Jaeger Abschied".....Mendelssohn
Kreissman's German Liederkranz.
5. Polonaise Concertante................
"Gruss an das Vaterland"
Composed for orchestra by Wittmann.
Arranged for brass music by G. Schnapp.
Germania Serenade Band.
6. Canzone—Ciascun la dice from "La Fille du Regiment"..............Donizetti
Madame Alboni.
7. Chorus—"The Heavens Are Telling," from the "Creation"..............Haydn
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

PART II.

8. Overture—"Oberon" ....Weber
Musical Fund Society.
9. Selection from the oratorio of "St. Paul"......................Mendelssohn
Mr. Arthurson.
Musical Education Society.
10. Trio—"Ah quel colpa," from "Il Barbiere"..........................Rossini
Mme. Alboni, Sig. Sangiovanni and Sig. Rovere.
11. Andante from fifth symphony....Beethoven
Musical Fund Society.
12. Rondo Finale—"Non piu mesta," from "Cenerentola"....................Rossini
Madame Alboni.
13. Hallelujah Chorus, from the "Messiah" Handel
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

The Herald of Nov. 22, 1852, the Monday after the opening of the hall, goes on to say:

"Yesterday forenoon the Rev. Theodore Parker preached his first sermon in the hall. Every seat on the floor, in the galleries and the orchestra was occupied."

Then, after telling what Mr. Parker preached about, it says:

"Mr. Parker will preach at the Music Hall on Thanksgiving forenoon. The society under his charge have engaged it for a regular place of worship."

On the night before this report was printed, Sunday, Mme. Sontag, who had already announced her farewell concert, in the style of Patti, some days before, gave a "positively farewell concert" in Music Hall. She gave another farewell on the next Tuesday evening. On Saturday evening, the 27th, the Germania Musical Society gave its first subscription concert. Mme. Albani gave her farewell concert on the evening of the 26th. The Germania course of concerts lasted all that winter, with public rehearsals every Wednesday afternoon.

This hall was for many years unsurpassed for musical purposes by any other hall in the country. The intention was to erect a hall for great concerts of vocal and orchestral music, as perfect in its acoustic qualities as modern theory could make it.

A short description of the hall will hardly be out of place at this time. Its dimensions are 130 feet in length, 78 in width and 65 in height. Among the decorations are a cast of the Belvidere Apollo, presented by Charlotte Cushman, which fills a niche at one end of the hall. At the opposite end is the bronze statue of Beethoven, by Crawford, the gift of Charles C. Perkins. The seating capacity is about 2600. Bumstead Hall, under Music Hall, seats about 800, and is in the shape of the Agora at Athens. It has been used mainly for rehearsals, meetings of the Handel and Haydn Society and billiard matches.

The great organ, which was the pride of Boston for 20 years, was "inaugurated" on the night of Saturday, Nov. 2, 1863. The movement to buy an organ for Music Hall began when the hall was opened, for the proceeds of the first concert, Nov. 20, 1852, were set aside as a starter for an organ fund. The instrument was built by Herr E. F. Walcker of Ludwigsburg, Wurtemberg, who also built the cathedral organ at Ulm. It contained 5474 pipes, of which 690 were in the pedal organ and 84 registers. It had all the improvements known at the time of its building.

The organ was first heard by the public on the night of Nov. 2, 1863. There was a great celebration in honor of the event. Charlotte Cushman read an ode to the organ, written for the occasion. John K. Paine struck the public note on the organ, playing selections from Bach. Mr. Paine was organist of the Old West Church and musical instructor at Harvard. Herr Friedrich Walcker, son of the builder, officially opened the organ. W. Eugene Thayer of Worcester played a fugue in C minor from Bach, who seemed to be the favorite of the night. George W. Morgan, organist of Grace Church, New York, played from Handel's "Israel in Egypt." B. J. Lang, organist of the Old South Church, played a sonata of Mendelssohn, the words of which were sung by the Handel and Haydn Society. Dr. S. P. Tuckerman, organist of St. Paul's, played church music from Palestrina and an anthem of Purcell. The "Hallelujah Chorus" of Handel was played by George W. Morgan. The money went to a fund to keep the instrument in repair, and other concerts for the same purpose were held every few nights for a long time. These "organ fund concerts" were kept up for a number of years.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave a grand choral inauguration of the organ on the night of Nov. 28, 1863, to help pay the organ debt, for it was not bought for cash. Among the selections were the "Hallelujah Chorus," Handel's "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," Martin Luther's choral, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," arranged by Otto Nicolai, and, as a second half of the programme, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang." The concert was repeated by request soon after, with Carl Zerrahn as director.

The "Messiah" was given for the first time with the new organ by the Handel and Hayden Society on Dec. 27 of that year. The Orchestral Union started on its 10th season, with the new organ, Jan. 13, 1864.

A great event was the celebration of the 300 years that had passed since the birth of Shakespeare, on April 23, 1864. A number of singers, well known in their time, took part. Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus" and the "First Walpurgis Night," words by Goethe and music by Mendelssohn, were given.

On May 26 next, the American Tract Society celebrated its 50th year mark, Henry Ward Beecher being one of the speakers.

The next event of interest was on June 8 of the same year, when Admiral Lessoffsky and the officers of the Russian fleet were honored with a musical festival, in which the public school children took part.

On April 16, 1865, a grand choral performance marked the close of the civil war, being given in honor of the great victories. The Handel and Haydn sang "Israel in Egypt," the "Messiah" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise."

A solemn occasion was the memorial service for the martyred President, on the afternoon of June 1, 1865, under the direction of the municipal authorities. Mayor Lincoln presided. The Handel and Haydn Society sang a dirge from "Judas Maccabaeus." The eulogy was made by Charles Sumner. A choral was sung, "Luther's Judgment Hymn," with English words by Oliver Wendell Holmes.

The next July 4 was a gala occasion, for the celebration of the 89th year of independence was also one of the close of the war. An original hymn was read by Julia Ward Howe.

The first symphony concert was given on Dec. 28, 1865, by the Harvard Musical Association, the forerunner of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Carl Zerrahn was director. A course of six concerts was begun.

Among the singers of the day who were heard from the great stage were Clara Louise Kellogg, Annie Louise Cary, Adelaide Phillips, Mlle. Parepa, Mrs. J. B. Cary and Matilda Phillips. Jenny Lind was another, and Christine Nilsson also. Among the popular entertainments were the Mercantile Library course, the Bay State course, the Redpath lectures and the Bateman concerts.

The dead war Governor, John A. Andrew, was honored with a great memorial service on Nov. 26, 1867. Edwin P. Whipple made the eulogy, Julia Ward Howe read a poem, and James Freeman Clarke offered prayer.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave its first three-year May festival in the spring of 1868, with "Samson," "St. Paul," Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony," the last for the first time in this country, the "Messiah" and the "Creation."

Clara Louise Kellogg gave concerts and Mrs. Scott Siddons readings soon after, and John B. Gough lectured on total abstinence. The New England Conservatory also began to give concerts, and Theodore Thomas made his appearance with his great orchestra from New York.

The Rev. W. H. H. Murray began his sermons in Music Hall on June 20, 1875, under the auspices of De Molay commandery. The first regular services of Mr. Murray's new church were held on Oct. 3, 1875, and the church went out of existence on June 2, 1878, as near as the records of the hall show.

P. T. Barnum lectured on "The World and How to Live in It," Hans von Buelow gave recitals and Minot Savage lectured.

On March 17, 1876, the 100th anniversary of the evacuation of Boston was celebrated, the oration being made by George E. Ellis, D. D. The next Fourth of July Robert C. Winthrop made the oration, and Brooks Adams read the Declaration.

A great occasion was the testimonial to Ole Bull, who had married the sister of Longfellow, on Dec. 8, 1876. A number of the gentlemen who took part were Alexander H. Rice, James T. Fields, Henry W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, William Gaston, John D. Runkle, William B. Rogers, R. H. Dana, Jr., Oliver Ditson, Edward Everett Hale, Marshall P. Wilder and Alpheus Hardy.

The "Old South fund," to buy the Old South Church for a museum, was aided by a grand ball on Feb. 18, 1879. A memorial service to Gen. Joseph Hooker was held on Nov. 16 of the same year.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was founded in 1881, judging from the records, and played in Music Hall in its second season, and thence ever after. George Henschel was the director then. The Cecelia sang in 1877. The New England Conservatory gave its 1000th concert on May 17, 1882, the concerts beginning in 1867. On Nov. 1, 1882, Christine Nilsson made her first appearance in this country at Music Hall, under the management of Henry E. Abbey. This brings us down to recent history.

The great organ was taken out in 1884, on account of its crowding the Symphony orchestra too much, and the great sounding board was put in soon after. Dr. Tourgee had the organ stored in a shed behind the Conservatory, in hopes that the city would let him have part of the Old South burying ground for a concert hall for the organ. The city declined, however. The organ was sold last spring to Edwin F. Searles of Methuen for $1500. It cost $60,000.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MARCH 15, 1898

MUSIC HALL OR OPERA HOUSE?

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The sale of the Boston Music Hall property brings the question of what shall be done with the property of the "New Boston Music Hall Association" into unexpected prominence, and I trust that you will, as usual, give the use of the needed space in your columns for a discussion of the action to be taken in this matter.

Although not a stockholder in the corporation, circumstances made it possible at the time of the subscription to be of material assistance in arousing public interest in the movement, and my professional duties at that time compelled me to thoroughly acquaint myself with the whole subject, and to make a study of public auditoriums both abroad and at home. I had interviews with many of the best architects of Boston and New York, and obtained opinions from many lovers of music who have enjoyed opportunities of hearing concerts and other musical performances in every big city on both sides of the Atlantic.

The object of my inquiries at that time was to get information and not to prove the correctness of any given theory, and I now ask the liberty of opening up a discussion of the action to be taken by the "New Boston Music Hall Association," in order that the greatest musical good for the greatest possible number of the musical public may result from such action.

Allow me to preface my remarks upon the main subject by a protest against the criticisms made upon the location selected in the purchase of the land at the junction of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. If those who complain of this location will take a map of the section of the city south and west of Boston Common and find an estate or estates upon which a place of amusement arranged to seat over eight hundred people can be built upon, in compliance with the present building laws, which can be bought at a price that will make its use for such a purpose practicable, and is nearer Boston Common than the land now owned by the "New Music Hall Association," then I will admit the reasonableness of their objection. Real estate experts have failed in their endeavors to do this.

Now regarding the use of the property. If the purpose contemplated when the new corporation was formed, the building of a music hall, is carried out, the coming musical generation in this city will be deprived of much that it should enjoy, and the education of the Boston public in musical matters will take on limitations that will make the city more and more provincial in this characteristic. A new Music Hall may possibly supply an ideal home for the Symphony concerts, but the desirability of continuing to sacrifice every other line of musical development in the life of this city for the sake of maintaining these concerts is, I am rejoiced to say, becoming more and more realized among those who have studied the tendency of this yearly extravagance in the support of the Symphonies.

The money subscribed by the 290 or more stockholders to the "New Music Hall Association" was not raised specifically for a "music hall," but to provide a home for the Symphony Orchestra; and whatever plans may have been in the minds of the three trustees to whom the money was paid, it was at least an open question with the subscribers whether a music hall or an opera house was to be built. The money was raised from musical enthusiasts and for the interests of music.

In considering how this property can be used to best benefit the cause of music it may be well to recall the situation when the present Music Hall was built. Then the appeal for subscriptions was based upon the highest ideals, and the completion of the hall was looked upon as a step upward and onward in the development of the musical life of Boston. Let me ask those who accept what is as what should be if in their opinion the appeal for subscriptions to build the present Music Hall would have been successful if its uses in these later years had ever been dreamed of. Yet it is now contemplated to turn over the property of the "New Music Hall Association and the building of another Music Hall to the present officers of the new association, who are the identical men who have sanctioned the use of the present Music Hall for prize fights, cake walks, cat and dog shows, all-night dancing parties and other uses equally objectionable and equally at odds with all ideas of propriety and good taste. I have no personal antagonism toward Messrs. Henry L. Higginson and Charles E. Cotting, but I ask in all seriousness, has the management of Music Hall in recent years been such as to warrant a belief that these two gentlemen, who are alone responsible for the uses to which Music Hall has been put in recent years, will maintain any higher standing for a new hall of which they may be given control.

I have taken pains to fortify my own opinions regarding the possibilities of developing the New Music Hall property, and I have yet, with a single exception, to find any opposition among the company's stockholders to a reorganization of the company so as to allow of the building of not only a "home for the Symphony Orchestra" but a home also for operatic performances and for buildings suited to schools and instruction rooms for all lines of musical education. If the property is placed in the hands of men and women having a knowledge of and interest in the largest welfare of the musical public, it can be so used as to give this city a new start in its musical life and present possibilities for its thousands of musical students that have been demanded for many years by those open to conviction regarding such matters.

A well-appointed opera house, the use of which should be exclusively restricted to musical performances, could easily be arranged to give the best possible results in orchestral concerts, and the future patrons of the Symphonies could enjoy their weekly musical devotions with surroundings somewhat more in harmony with these performances than those provided in the present Music Hall. The classic lines of Mr. Higginson's woodshed roof would of course be missed, and the dull, dark and dismal decoration planned for the old auditorium by Mr. Cotting could not be enjoyed, but, with due fortitude, these deprivations could be borne.

It is difficult to fully state the advantages to the city which would result from the possession of such an opera house and buildings, under the control of directors having the same interest in music as has been so loyally shown by those who have directed the development of the Art Museum and Public Library in this city. It would, first of all, secure a permanent opera company with the yearly production of standard operas and the occasional bringing out of the works of native musicians which are now piled up and packed away every year by the discouraged applicants for a hearing from managers having interests other than the musical development of Boston. It would open up a field for American singers in reputable productions, now seldom supplied in America. It would give the students of orchestral instruments a possible opening other than those of the theatre orchestra and ballroom. It would complete the scheme of instruction now so admirably supplied otherwise by the New England Conservatory of Music, and put Boston, as she should be, in the advance in all that goes to supply a liberal musical education.

I do not wish to be understood as advising a repetition of the National Opera scheme, for I opposed the extravagance of Mrs. Thurber and Messrs. Theodore Thomas and Charles E. Locke in that undertaking from the start. I desire an opéra populaire," as it might be called. An opera house and company within the limits of moderation, to produce the line of operas within the repertoire of the Opéra Comique of Paris, leaving the grander works to the more liberal New York public, which includes a different element from what is found in this city.

It will not be found necessary to call upon musical Europe to maintain such an organization. America has an ample supply of singers and musicians, and the establishment of a permanent opera scheme here would make Boston a Mecca for hundreds of good American artists now engaged abroad, where they have had to be satisfied with fame in place of anticipated fortune.

Regarding the financial side of this matter, I will only say that if the property under consideration is given in charge of men and women who will show the same devotion to music as others in the city have recently shown in the cause of religion, there will be found no need of calling upon the subscribers to the stock of the "New Music Hall Association" for another cent.

FRED P. BACON

Boston, March 14.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 21, 1898.

The "Scotch" Symphony Given by the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday's programme began with Mendelsshon's "Scotch" symphony, generally considered the best orchestral work of the composer.

Amid all the dissonances and abnormal orchestral effects of "these most brisk and giddy-paced times" the A minor symphony wears well, and one views it with the greater respect when it is remembered that some of its points of scoring were practically inventions at the time it was written; such a point, for example, was the use of the deep register of the clarinette in the introduction, giving a spectral and uncanny touch to the weird north-land picture; Mendelssohn and Weber may be credited with discovering this ghost-like tone-color, for Beethoven and Mozart, both fond of the instrument, seem not to have been aware of its especially gloomy effects.

The work was read by Mr. Paur and played by the orchestra in an absolutely perfect manner; we cannot recall so satisfactory an interpretation of it. The scherzo was its most charming number, and here again the clarinette was in the foreground and deserves especial commendation for the clearness and surety which characterized its phrases. This scherzo is not only the acme of daintiness but it is one of the rare instances of a German composer catching the true Scottish spirit.

Many foreign composers have come under the spell of the glorious folk-music of Scotland, but very few have been able to reproduce it. Beethoven tried it and simply Teutonized his Scottish melodies; Bruch studied its repertoire and eliminated all trace of the heather out of his highly developed Scottish themes; Schumann used syncopations which, however pretty, did not succeed in establishing the lilt of Caledonia; but Mendelssohn in this scherzo caught the true spirit of Strathspey and Reel, and in "Oh wert thou in the Cauld Blast" and in the finale of this same symphony he also pictured the tenderly mournful side of the folk-music of Scotland.

The general trend of modern music toward extreme effects has left Mendelssohn a rather thinly-clad figure in the matter of scoring and of harmonic progressions, but his scherzo movements can still hold their own against the turgid tide, and they remain excellent examples of what a scherzo should be.

Beethoven himself was too frequently grotesque, rather than playful, in his scherzi, and the latter day saints of composition are generally frenzied instead of jocose, but Mendelssohn, whom Wagner decried as a mere copy of others, was an originator in this field, and his scherzo movements may still serve as models to these who seek the perfection of this form.

But the Adagio movement of this symphony is made of more perishable stuff; here is the effeminate "Songs-without-words" Mendelssohn; what England and Germany once held to be most poetic mournfulness we now perceive to be only a lace-handkerchief melancholy. Violins and violoncellos played the melodic theme with romantic fervor, but they could not galvanize it into life again.

We still find the finale an impressive movement; it is at times a veritable rhythmic fantasie, like portions of Beethoven's seventh symphony, and the plaintive sorrow expressed in its closing theme is masterly. The coda is weak and does not attain the majesty the composer intended.

Mr. Ffrangeon Davies was the soloist, and he began with a rather commonplace song from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe." He sang this well but it had very little to say for itself. The singer's clear enunciation might well be a model to the vocalists in this country of bad vocal elocution.

Mr. Davies's second number was of different calibre, being Wagner's "Wotan's Farewell," the closing scene of "Die Walkuere." In this the singer lacked something of sustained power, but the intelligence of his interpretation, the sympathetic quality of his voice, the eminently vocal style of his delivery, made the performance a commendable one.

Mr. Paur proved himself a magnificent director of accompaniment, for the elasticity of the tempi gave the singer all possible freedom and the dynamic force was always graded to his voice in the broad "feuer-zauber" where the voice was not powerful enough for the Wagner climax. Once or twice there were slips of intonation, but these were not frequent or pronounced enough to mar an excellent performance.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" was played for a second time—"durch hohem Befehl," which is "by request." It is said that Cherubini (we believe it was he) once heard a very complex and original work, and on being asked his opinion regarding it replied: "To understand that work one must hear it several times,—and I shall never hear it again!!" The Boston audience is placed in a better position to grapple with the abstruse points connected with the decease of this unfortunate viol d'amour. Tintagiles died of slow consumption; everything in the composition points to a slow and lingering death.

An enforced second hearing leads very nearly to the same result that the first one did; one can compliment the talented composer most heartily upon his mastery of the details of the most modern orchestration; one can find most beautiful passages in the course of the long composition; one can pay homage to the magnificent contrasts between power and pomp on the one side and weakness and pathos on the other; but one feels that Tintagiles ought, like Charles II., to apologize for being such a long time about his dying.

Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel played the two 14-stringed instruments with great beauty. Mr. Loeffler, who is personally as popular as any musician in Boston, was called for twice at the end of the composition.

The song of Mr. Davies was not the only operatic echo given in this contrasted programme, the farewell of the god who shakes diatonic scales out of his spear was followed by evolutions of his cavalry; "The Ride of the Valkyries" (we think the word "Valkyrior" decidedly inferior,—which is not only poetry but truth) was given with enough power to fit a regiment of Uhlans.

The next programme is to be made up entirely of symphonies; this, in connection with the above number, gives us an idea which we present to our conductor; why not have a musical horse-show? One can gather a whole stable from the modern repertoire. There is Raff's skittish charger in the finale of the "Lenore" symphony, there is the lively span driven by Faust and Mephistopheles through the latter part of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," there is the runaway team driven by Phaeton, and scored by St. Saens, and here are the mounts of the Valkyries, surely sufficient to make a very lively running.

The performance of the "Ritt der Walkueren" was rather too loud in the brass parts, so that many of the chromatic phrases which add much to the excitement of the number were inaudible. There is a good deal more than trombone playing in this number, but on this occasion one had to imagine many of the other parts.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Repetition of Mr. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" at the Nineteenth Concert — Mr. Ffrangcon-Davis the Singer of the Evening.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch" .... Mendelssohn
Sir Brian's Song, "Woo Thou Thy Snowflake," from "Ivanhoe" .... Sullivan
"The Death of Tintagiles" (suggested by the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck), Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violes d'Amour obbligate ...... Loeffler
(The violes d'Amour by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.)
Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Charm, from "The Valkyr" .... Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries, from "The Valkyr" .... Wagner

The program-book announced "The Ride of the Valkyrior." This was not a missprint. Mr. Apthorp on page 599 again refers to the "Valkyrior," which he, following Bulfinch of "Age of Fable" fame, evidently regards as the plural of Valkyr. He might as well use "Valkyriur," which, as he tells us in a footnote, is the plural-form "in the original Icelandic." He might as well use the modern Icelandic "Valkyrja" for Valkyr.

This freak of Mr. Apthorp is unendurable. The plural of Valkyr is Valkyries—that is if you are writing or speaking English, and the program-book is supposed to be written in that language.

⁂

It was a pleasure, and, to me at least, it was education to hear Mr. Loeffler's highly imaginative work a second time. The pages that seemed strong after the first hearing seem still stronger after the second. The opening of this symphonic poem is that of a master, and the cantilena in the introduction is of truer thematic beauty and more sustained character than are as a rule the cantabile themes of this composer. There is a wealth of interesting orchestral detail as well as harmonic treatment throughout the work, which is in many ways remarkable. I still think that the violes d'amour are used at too great length. The peculiar sweetness of the tone of this instrument soon sours. And I am still inclined to think that the work as a whole is too much spun-out.

⁂

Mr. Ffrangcon Davies first showed in this city his dramatic abilities as a singer when he gave a memorable performance of Elijah in a concert of the Handel and Haydn.

The aria from "Ivanhoe," which he sang last night, is chiefly interesting on account of the cheerful misinformation concerning the amatory habits of the lion to which Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert likens himself in Sullivan's opera. Zoologists will be pleased to learn that this noble animal—I refer to the lion, not Sir Brian—brings "his wild mate docile to his side," and "in the dessert leads his tawny bride." The music is cheap, tawdry, pointless. It is Sullivan in his most genteel drawing room mood, when even in burning passion he remembers that he is in the presence of ladies. Mr. Davies sang with taste and skill. Any intensity that was noticeable was due to the individuality of the singer, not to the song.

Wotan's "Farewell" needs a heavier voice, and I fear that Mr. Davies sang this music too well. It was a pleasure to recognize his intelligence; it was also a pleasure to observe his mastery of song, when the song made its way through the orchestra, which was not always the case.

⁂

The symphony was finely read and admirably played. The first two movements are delightful music. It is a pity that Mendelssohn did not stop before the adagio and leave the symphony unfinished. The orchestra maintained its high reputation in the other numbers, with the exception of "The Ride of the Valkyries," in which the brass was rhythmically logy.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIII., NO. 79.
SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme Presented to Last Night's Audience in Music Hall.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night was:

Symphony, A minor, "Scotch" .... Mendelssohn
"Woo Thou Thy Snowflake," from "Ivanhoe" .... Sullivan
"The Death of Tintagiles" ...... C. M. Loeffler
Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm ..... Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries .... Wagner

The soloist was Mr. Ffrangcon Davies.

The Mendelssohn symphony retains much of its original freshness, and nearly all of its interest. It was good to hear it again, especially in such a sympathetic, beautifully colored and finished an interpretation as Mr. Paur gave of it. The opening movement and the scherzo especially received charming treatment, and the performance of the work from beginning to end was exquisite in every way.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem interested as much by its vigorous originality and made fully as strong an impression as attended its first performance. Another hearing brought into a clearer light much that seemed vague and bizarre on the previous presentation of the work. That it is abundant in power, invention and brilliant musicianship need not be repeated. As before, the viole d'amour parts were played by Mr. Franz Kneisel and the composer, and also as before, the latter was tremendously applauded and recalled many times.

Mr. Davies, who was welcomed very cordially, sang the air from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" very finely, but it is a question if the air was worth the singing. It is tame, conventional and more distinguished for its weak platitudes than for anything more noteworthy. Taken generally, it appeared to be one of the composer's drawing room songs, disporting itself on stilts, and very awkwardly at that. It was scarcely worthy the powers of Mr. Davies, whose splendid voice was at its best, and who sang with the breadth of style, the tunefulness and the artistic phrasing and sentiment that make his singing a delight. In the Wagner scene his intelligent appreciation of the music and the dignity of expression with which he sang it did it every justice. Had his voice been of a more powerful calibre than it is, the effort would have fallen nothing short of perfection.

The orchestral portion of the scene was magnificently given, and in a manner that was none the less effective because it was not continuously noisy and because it paid due consideration to the singer. The Valkyrie ride was read with no less discretion and with a richness and a variety of tone and color it has rarely received here. The orchestra through the whole concert was at its highest point of efficiency and enthusiasm. Mr. Davies was applauded with great fervor and was stormily recalled after each of his contributions to the programme.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The selections for the next concert are: Symphony No. 2, in D, Haydn; symphony in C, "Jupiter," Mozart; symphony No. 8, in F, Beethoven.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1898.

Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

Mr Ffrancon Davies, the famous basso, was the soloist at the 19th symphony concert, the program of which was as follows: Symphony No. 3, "Scotch," A minor, Mendelssohn; Sir Brian's song from "Ivanhoe," Sullivan; symphonic poem, for orchestra and two violas d'amour obligato, Loeffler; Wotan's "Farewell and Fire-Charm," from "The Valkyr," Wagner; "The Ride of the Valkyrior," from "The Valkyr," Wagner.

Mr Davies has a voice of remarkable purity for a basso. It is not very deep, but its quality is excellent, especially in the higher register, and the singer has it under perfect control, and his enunciation of the text is distinct and easily heard. He introduced a basso aria from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," which was new at these concerts, and his interpretation was thoroughly enjoyable, the lights and shades of expression being artistically shown, and the whole spirit of the composition being treated in a sympathetic manner. His mezzo voice deserves special commendation, the singer having mastered the art of using the "musical whisper" melodiously and without a deterioration in tone production. "Wotan's Farewell" was not as well suited to Mr Davies' voice as the Sullivan number, a heavier bass being requisite to make the aria impressive and also to successfully cope with the heavy orchestration. Aside from the lack of power Mr Davies sang the excerpt admirably, delivering the apostrophe to Loge with good dramatic effect. He was most heartily applauded at the close of each number.

Mr Loeffler's symphonic poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour, heard here earlier in the season, was given with the composer and Mr Kneisel as the performers upon the obsolete instruments. The composition is of the modern school and somewhat sensational at times, but to a musical expert it is an interesting contributon to musical literature. It is scored elaborately and very skilfully, and was received with evident favor by the auditors. Mr Kneisel and Mr Loeffler performed their tasks perfectly, and the orchestra played with more precision and achieved better results than at the former concert.

Mendelssohn's great "Scotch" symphony, given with merely a short pause between the different movements, was a splendid example of the symphony men at their best. The second and fourth parts displayed the acme of orchestral harmony. Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrior" was played with the usual dash and brilliancy.

There will be no symphony concerts this week. The program next week will comprise Haydn's D major symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 20, 1898.

Mr. Paur's nineteenth programme began with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which is not too often heard. The reading was so full and fine that the beautiful work took on new delicacy and grace, while there was such careful skill in marking just emphases and illuminating special points that the scoring—so simple in comparison with the fashions of the day—seemed often more full and strong than it actually is. The wind choir, upon which the composer depended so much, was especially rich and warm in tone. And indeed the whole symphony was so perfectly in head and hand that Mr. Paur frequently left the orchestra for quite long passages with scarcely an indication of his direction—and this even in the vivace and the penultimate allegro. The second orchestral selection was a repetition of Mr. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles," which made a new and deep impression and won him fresh plaudits. His poetic ingenuity in depicting the material tempest and suggesting the storm of fate, in conveying the soft sympathy of the cherishing sister and the doomed boy, as well as in noting the imperious advance of the catastrophe, were again observed with admiration, although a question seemed to rise naturally as to whether the return of the storm were not too long for the musical score, while it might still be in proportion as an element of Maeterlinck's scene. The sweet, strange, penetrating voices of the violes d'amour which Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kneisel played, were welcomed once more by the listeners. Later the orchestra played splendidly the "Fire Charm" and "Ride of the Valkyries," having previously accompanied "Wotan's Farewell" so pitilessly that the demigod's representative might have saved himself the trouble of singing all the first part of his music and a good deal of the last of it. The singer was Mr. Frangcon Davies, who seems likely to get into a bad way if he does not turn his steps at once into safe paths. He had best let Wagner pretty thoroughly alone, as his strained tones, his marked tremolo and his violent and vicious breathing in the Wotan scene demonstrated only too plainly. Earlier in the programme he introduced a scene of Brian de Bois-Guilbert from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe." This has no particular value for thought, emotion or style; but, if delivered with rude passion and fierce vehemence, might carry weight. Mr. Davies vocalized it beautifully, although the tessitura is really too high for him; but, while he was not unemphatic, he was undramatic. For no one who had not the words before him but might more easily have imagined the song to be one for Romeo or Faust or Don Giovanni than for the lawless, cruel, selfish, arrogant Templar.

The next concert—on April second—will be indeed a symphony affair, as the programme consists entirely of Haydn's second, Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's eighth.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.
Seventy-fifth year—Vol. LIII. No. 296
MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY.

An Excellent Concert, With Mr. Ffrangcon Davies as Soloist. Mr. Loeffler's Work Again.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; nineteenth concert. Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch" Mendelssohn
Sir Brian's Song. "Woo Thou Thy Snowflake." from "Ivanhoe" .... Sullivan
"The Death of Tintagiles" (suggested by the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck), Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violes d'Amour obligate .... Loeffler
(The violes d'Amour by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.)
Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Charm, from "The Valkyr" .... Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries, from "The Valkyr" .... Wagner

Mendelssohn's ever-beautiful "Scotch" symphony was delightfully played, of course, and if the self-important kettle drummer could only have been made to realize that the fate of the piece did not depend on the ferocity of his thumping, the effect would have been all the better. Why he has not been suppressed years ago passes all comprehension. However, there were many places where he was "tacet," and among them the adagio, which I still consider one of the loveliest of orchestral songs.

Mr. Ffrangcon Davies sang with superb breadth and purity of voice in the "Ivanhoe" aria. To tell the truth, the piece is rather wishy-washy, though melodious enough in the commoner Sullivanesque style, and shows strong traces of Gounod. But the dramatic strength and natural beauty of tone that Mr. Davies displayed invested it with interest and a certain effectiveness. In "Wotan's Farewell," where the most powerful and sonorous of bass voices are absolutely demanded, the singer made less impression, although it was impossible not to regard his work with admiration.

The repetition of Mr. Loeffler's weird "Death of Tintagiles" was welcome in that it afforded a better opportunity for decision as to its merits. It seems to me that it is one of the strongest, most original and highly finished symphonic poems of recent years. The note of gloom and impending tragedy is everywhere present, even in the mournfully sweet singing of the viols d'amour, while the terror of the story finds excellent expression through Mr. Loeffler's rich and complex orchestration. The work was given with the utmost brilliancy. Everything was "ex cathedra," of course, with the composer playing one of the obligato instruments.

A dashing performance of the "Ride of the Valkyries" closed the concert, which was, on the whole, a pleasant and profitable one.

WILDER D. QUINT.

[93]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 21, 1898.

The "Scotch" Symphony Given by the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday's programme began with Mendelsshon's "Scotch" symphony, generally considered the best orchestral work of the composer.

Amid all the dissonances and abnormal orchestral effects of "these most brisk and giddy-paced times" the A minor symphony wears well, and one views it with the greater respect when it is remembered that some of its points of scoring were practically inventions at the time it was written; such a point, for example, was the use of the deep register of the clarinette in the introduction. giving a spectral and uncanny touch to the weird north-land picture; Mendelssohn and Weber may be credited with discovering this ghost-like tone-color, for Beethoven and Mozart, both fond of the instrument, seem not to have been aware of its especially gloomy effects.

The work was read by Mr. Paur and played by the orchestra in an absolutely perfect manner; we cannot recall so satisfactory an interpretation of it. The scherzo was its most charming number, and here again the clarinette was in the foreground and deserves especial commendation for the clearness and surety which characterized its phrases. This scherzo is not only the acme of daintiness but it is one of the rare instances of a German composer catching the true Scottish spirit.

Many foreign composers have come under the spell of the glorious folk-music of Scotland, but very few have been able to reproduce it. Beethoven tried it and simply Teutonized his Scottish melodies; Bruch studied its repertoire and eliminated all trace of the heather out of his highly developed Scottish themes; Schumann used syncopations which, however pretty, did not succeed in establishing the lilt of Caledonia; but Mendelssohn in this scherzo caught the true spirit of Strathspey and Reel, and in "Oh wert thou in the Cauld Blast" and in the finale of this same symphony he also pictured the tenderly mournful side of the folk-music of Scotland.

The general trend of modern music toward extreme effects has left Mendelssohn a rather thinly-clad figure in the matter of scoring and of harmonic progressions, but his scherzo movements can still hold their own against the turgid tide, and they remain excellent examples of what a scherzo should be.

Beethoven himself was too frequently grotesque, rather than playful, in his scherzi, and the latter day saints of composition are generally frenzied instead of jocose, but Mendelssohn, whom Wagner decried as a mere copy of others, was an originator in this field, and his scherzo movements may still serve as models to those who seek the perfection of this form.

But the Adagio movement of this symphony is made of more perishable stuff; here is the effeminate "Songs-without-words" Mendelssohn; what England and Germany once held to be most poetic mournfulness we now perceive to be only a lace-handkerchief melancholy. Violins and violoncellos played the melodic theme with romantic fervor, but they could not galvanize it into life again.

We still find the finale an impressive movement; it is at times a veritable rhythmic fantasie, like portions of Beethoven's seventh symphony, and the plaintive sorrow expressed in its closing theme is masterly. The coda is weak and does not attain the majesty the composer intended.

Mr. Ffrangeon Davies was the soloist, and he began with a rather commonplace song from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe." He sang this well but it had very little to say for itself. The singer's clear enunciation might well be a model to the vocalists in this country of bad vocal elocution.

Mr. Davies's second number was of different calibre, being Wagner's "Wotan's Farewell," the closing scene of "Die Walkuere." In this the singer lacked something of sustained power, but the intelligence of his interpretation, the sympathetic quality of his voice, the eminently vocal style of his delivery, made the performance a commendable one.

Mr. Paur proved himself a magnificent director of accompaniment, for the elasticity of the tempi gave the singer all possible freedom and the dynamic force was ayways graded to his voice in the broad "feuer-zauber" where the voice was not powerful enough for the Wagner climax. Once or twice there were slips of intonation, but these were not frequent or pronounced enough to mar an excellent performance.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" was played for a second time—"durch hohem Befehl," which is "by request." It is said that Cherubini (we believe it was he) once heard a very complex and original work, and on being asked his opinion regarding it replied: "To understand that work one must hear it several times,—and I shall never hear it again!!" The Boston audience is placed in a better position to grapple with the abstruse points connected with the decease of this unfortunate viol d'amour. Tintagiles died of slow consumption; everything in the composition points to a slow and lingering death.

An enforced second hearing leads very nearly to the same result that the first one did; one can compliment the talented composer most heartily upon his mastery of the details of the most modern orchestration; one can find most beautiful passages in the course of the long composition; one can pay homage to the magnificent contrasts between power and pomp on the one side and weakness and pathos on the other; but one feels that Tintagiles ought, like Charles II., to apologize for being such a long time about his dying.

Messrs. Loeffler and Kneisel played the two 14-stringed instruments with great beauty. Mr. Loeffler, who is personally as popular as any musician in Boston, was called for twice at the end of the composition.

The song of Mr. Davies was not the only operatic echo given in this contrasted programme, the farewell of the god who shakes diatonic scales out of his spear was followed by evolutions of his cavalry; "The Ride of the Valkyries" (we think the word "Valkyrior" decidedly inferior,—which is not only poetry but truth) was given with enough power to fit a regiment of Uhlans.

The next programme is to be made up entirely of symphonies; this, in connection with the above number, gives us an idea which we present to our conductor; why not have a musical horse-show? One can gather a whole stable from the modern repertoire. There is Raff's skittish charger in the finale of the "Lenore" symphony, there is the lively span driven by Faust and Mephistopheles through the latter part of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," there is the runaway team driven by Phaeton, and scored by St. Saens, and here are the mounts of the Valkyries, surely sufficient to make a very lively running.

The performance of the "Ritt der Walkueren" was rather too loud in the brass parts, so that many of the chromatic phrases which add much to the excitement of the number were inaudible. There is a good deal more than trombone playing in this number, but on this occasion one had to imagine many of the other parts.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Repetition of Mr. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles" at the Nineteenth Concert — Mr. Ffrangcon-Davis the Singer of the Evening.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch" Mendelssohn
Sir Brian's Song, "Woo Thou Thy Snowflake," from "Ivanhoe"........Sullivan
"The Death of Tintagiles" (suggested by the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck). Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violes d'Amour obbligate......Loeffler
(The violes d'Amour by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.)
Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Charm, from "The Valkyr"........................Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries, from "The Valkyr" .... Wagner

The program-book announced "The Ride of the Valkyrior." This was not a missprint. Mr. Apthorp on page 599 again refers to the "Valkyrior," which he, following Bulfinch of "Age of Fable" fame, evidently regards as the plural of Valkyr. He might as well use "Valkyriur," which, as he tells us in a footnote, is the plural-form "in the original Icelandic." He might as well use the modern Icelandic "Valkyrja" for Valkyr.

This freak of Mr. Apthorp is unendurable. The plural of Valkyr is Valkyries—that is if you are writing or speaking English, and the program-book is supposed to be written in that language.

***

It was a pleasure, and, to me at least, it was education to hear Mr. Loeffler's highly imaginative work a second time. The pages that seemed strong after the first hearing seem still stronger after the second. The opening of this symphonic poem is that of a master, and the cantilena in the introduction is of truer thematic beauty and more sustained character than are as a rule the cantabile themes of this composer. There is a wealth of interesting orchestral detail as well as harmonic treatment throughout the work, which is in many ways remarkable. I still think that the violes d'amour are used at too great length. The peculiar sweetness of the tone of this instrument soon sours. And I am still inclined to think that the work as a whole is too much spun-out.

***

Mr. Ffrangcon Davies first showed in this city his dramatic abilities as a singer when he gave a memorable performance of Elijah in a concert of the Handel and Haydn.

The aria from "Ivanhoe," which he sang last night, is chiefly interesting on account of the cheerful misinformation concerning the amatory habits of the lion to which Sir Brian de Bois-Guilbert likens himself in Sullivan's opera. Zoologists will be pleased to learn that this noble animal—I refer to the lion, not Sir Brian—brings "his wild mate docile to his side," and "in the dessert leads his tawny bride." The music is cheap, tawdry, pointless. It is Sullivan in his most genteel drawing room mood, when even in burning passion he remembers that he is in the presence of ladies. Mr. Davies sang with taste and skill. Any intensity that was noticeable was due to the individuality of the singer, not to the song.

Wotan's "Farewell" needs a heavier voice, and I fear that Mr. Davies sang this music too well. It was a pleasure to recognize his intelligence; it was also a pleasure to observe his mastery of song, when the song made its way through the orchestra, which was not always the case.

***

The symphony was finely read and admirably played. The first two movements are delightful music. It is a pity that Mendelssohn did not stop before the adagio and leave the symphony unfinished. The orchestra maintained its high reputation in the other numbers, with the exception of "The Ride of the Valkyries," in which the brass was rhythmically logy.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CIII., NO. 79.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme Presented to Last Night's Audience in Music Hall.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last night was:

Symphony, A minor, "Scotch"....Mendelssohn
"Woo Thou Thy Snowflake," from "Ivanhoe"..................................Sullivan
"The Death of Tintagiles"......C. M. Loeffler
Wotan's Farewell and Fire Charm.....Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries.............Wagner

The soloist was Mr. Ffrangcon Davies.

The Mendelssohn symphony retains much of its original freshness, and nearly all of its interest. It was good to hear it again, especially in such a sympathetic, beautifully colored and finished an interpretation as Mr. Paur gave of it. The opening movement and the scherzo especially received charming treatment, and the performance of the work from beginning to end was exquisite in every way.

Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem interested as much by its vigorous originality and made fully as strong an impression as attended its first performance. Another hearing brought into a clearer light much that seemed vague and bizarre on the previous presentation of the work. That it is abundant in power, invention and brilliant musicianship need not be repeated. As before, the viole d'amour parts were played by Mr. Franz Kneisel and the composer, and also as before, the latter was tremendously applauded and recalled many times.

Mr. Davies, who was welcomed very cordially, sang the air from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" very finely, but it is a question if the air was worth the singing. It is tame, conventional and more distinguished for its weak platitudes than for anything more noteworthy. Taken generally, it appeared to be one of the composer's drawing room songs disporting itself on stilts, and very awkwardly at that. It was scarcely worthy the powers of Mr. Davies, whose splendid voice was at its best, and who sang with the breadth of style, the tunefulness and the artistic phrasing and sentiment that make his singing a delight. In the Wagner scene his intelligent appreciation of the music and the dignity of expression with which he sang it did it every justice. Had his voice been of a more powerful calibre than it is, the effort would have fallen nothing short of perfection.

The orchestral portion of the scene was magnificently given, and in a manner that was none the less effective because it was not continuously noisy and because it paid due consideration to the singer. The Valkyrie ride was read with no less discretion and with a richness and a variety of tone and color it has rarely received here. The orchestra through the whole concert was at its highest point of efficiency and enthusiasm. Mr. Davies was applauded with great fervor and was stormily recalled after each of his contributions to the programme.

There will be no public rehearsal and concert this week. The selections for the next concert are: Symphony No. 2, in D, Haydn; symphony in C, "Jupiter," Mozart; symphony No. 8, in F, Beethoven.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1898.

Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

Mr Ffrancon Davies, the famous basso, was the soloist at the 19th symphony concert, the program of which was as follows: Symphony No. 3, "Scotch," A minor, Mendelssohn; Sir Brian's song from "Ivanhoe," Sullivan; symphonic poem, for orchestra and two violas d'amour obligato, Loeffler; Wotan's "Farewell and Fire-Charm," from "The Valkyr," Wagner; "The Ride of the Valkyrior," from "The Valkyr," Wagner.

Mr Davies has a voice of remarkable purity for a basso. It is not very deep, but its quality is excellent, especially in the higher register, and the singer has it under perfect control, and his enunciation of the text is distinct and easily heard. He introduced a basso aria from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," which was new at these concerts, and his interpretation was thoroughly enjoyable, the lights and shades of expression being artistically shown, and the whole spirit of the composition being treated in a sympathetic manner. His mezzo voice deserves special commendation, the singer having mastered the art of using the "musical whisper" melodiously and without a deterioration in tone production. "Wotan's Farewell" was not as well suited to Mr Davies' voice as the Sullivan number, a heavier bass being requisite to make the aria impressive and also to successfully cope with the heavy orchestration. Aside from the lack of power Mr Davies sang the excerpt admirably, delivering the apostrophe to Loge with good dramatic effect. He was most heartily applauded at the close of each number.

Mr Loeffler's symphonic poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour, heard here earlier in the season, was given with the composer and Mr Kneisel as the performers upon the obsolete instruments. The composition is of the modern school and somewhat sensational at times, but to a musical expert it is an interesting contributon to musical literature. It is scored elaborately and very skilfully, and was received with evident favor by the auditors. Mr Kneisel and Mr Loeffler performed their tasks perfectly, and the orchestra played with more precision and achieved better results than at the former concert.

Mendelssohn's great "Scotch" symphony, given with merely a short pause between the different movements, was a splendid example of the symphony men at their best. The second and fourth parts displayed the acme of orchestral harmony. Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrior" was played with the usual dash and brilliancy.

There will be no symphony concerts this week. The program next week will comprise Haydn's D major symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 20, 1898.

Mr. Paur's nineteenth programme began with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which is not too often heard. The reading was so full and fine that the beautiful work took on new delicacy and grace, while there was such careful skill in marking just emphases and illuminating special points that the scoring—so simple in comparison with the fashions of the day—seemed often more full and strong than it actually is. The wind choir, upon which the composer depended so much, was especially rich and warm in tone. And indeed the whole symphony was so perfectly in head and hand that Mr. Paur frequently left the orchestra for quite long passages with scarcely an indication of his direction—and this even in the [illegible] and the penultimate allegro. The second orchestral selection was a repetition of Mr. Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles," which made a new and deep impression and won him fresh plau[illegible] [illegible]is poetic ingenuity in depicting the ma[illegible] [illegible]pest and suggesting the storm of fate, in [illegible]ing the soft sympathy of the cherishing siste[illegible] [illegible]e doomed boy, as well as in noting the imperce[illegible]vance of the catastrophe, were again [illegible]ved w[illegible] admiration, although a question se[illegible] to ris[illegible] naturally as to whether the return of th[illegible] storm were not too long for the musical scene, while it might still be in proportion as an element of Maeterlinck's scene. The sweet, strange, penetrating voices of the vio[illegible]amour which Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Kneisel p[illegible], were welcomed once more by the listeners. Later the orchestra played splendidly the "Fire [illegible]" and "Ride of the Valkyries," having pr[illegible] accompanied "Wotan's Farewell" so pitile[illegible] [illegible]he demigod's representative might have sa[illegible] [illegible] if the trouble of singing all the first part o[illegible] music and a good deal of the last of it. The s[illegible] was Mr. Frangcon Davies, who seems likely [illegible] into a bad way if he does not turn his steps a[illegible] into safe paths. He had best let Wagner pretty thoroughly alone, as his strained tones, his ma[illegible] tremolo and his violent and vicious breathing in the Wotan scene demonstrated only too plainly. Earlier in the programme he introduced a s[illegible] of Brian de Bois-Guilbert from Sullivan's [illegible] This has no particular value for thou[illegible] [illegible]or style; but, if delivered with rude pass[illegible] vehemence, might carry weight. Mr. Da[illegible] [illegible]alized it beautifully, although the tessit[illegible] really too high for him; but, while he was [illegible]mphatic, he was undramatic. For no one w[illegible] had not the words before him but might mo[illegible] have imagined the song to be one for [illegible] or Faust or Don Giovanni than for the law[illegible] [illegible]uel, selfish, arrogant Templar.

The next concert—on April second—will be indeed a symphony affair, as the programme consists entirely of Haydn's second, Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's eighth.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER. President.

Seventy-fifth year—Vol. LIII. No. 296

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY.

An Excellent Concert, With Mr. Ffrangcon Davies as Soloist. Mr. Loeffler's Work Again.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; nineteenth concert. Mr. Ffrangcon Davies, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch" Mendelssohn
Sir Brian's Song, "Woo Thou Thy Snowflake," from "Ivanhoe" ....Sullivan
"The Death of Tintagiles" (suggested by the drama by Maurice Maeterlinck), Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violes d'Amour obligate........Loeffler
(The violes d'Amour by Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. C. M. Loeffler.)
Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Charm, from "The Valkyr" ....Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries, from "The Valkyr" ....Wagner

Mendelssohn's ever-beautiful "Scotch" symphony was delightfully played, of course, and if the self-important kettle drummer could only have been made to realize that the fate of the piece did not depend on the ferocity of his thumping, the effect would have been all the better. Why he has not been suppressed years ago passes all comprehension. However, there were many places where he was "tacet," and among them the adagio, which I still consider one of the loveliest of orchestral songs.

Mr. Ffrangcon Davies sang with superb breadth and purity of voice in the "Ivanhoe" aria. To tell the truth, the piece is rather wishy-washy, though melodious enough in the commoner Sullivanesque style, and shows strong traces of Gounod. But the dramatic strength and natural beauty of tone that Mr. Davies displayed invested it with interest and a certain effectiveness. In "Wotan's Farewell," where the most powerful and sonorous of bass voices are absolutely demanded, the singer made less impression, although it was impossible not to regard his work with admiration.

The repetition of Mr. Loeffler's weird "Death of Tintagiles" was welcome in that it afforded a better opportunity for decision as to its merits. It seems to me that it is one of the strongest, most original and highly finished symphonic poems of recent years. The note of gloom and impending tragedy is everywhere present, even in the mournfully sweet singing of the viols d'amour, while the terror of the story finds excellent expression through Mr. Loeffler's rich and complex orchestration. The work was given with the utmost brilliancy. Everything was "ex cathedra," of course, with the composer playing one of the obligato instruments.

A dashing performance of the "Ride of the Valkyries" closed the concert, which was, on the whole, a pleasant and profitable one.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The nineteenth symphony concert brought the following programme:

Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A Minor, "Scotch," opus 56.
Sullivan: Sir Brian's Song, "Woo thou thy snowflake," from "Ivanhoe."
(First time in Boston.)
Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles" (suggested by the Drama by Maurice Maeterlinck), for Orchestra and two Violes d'Amour obbligate (MS.)
Wagner: Wotans Abschied and Feuerzauber, from "Die Walküre."
Wagner: Der Ritt der Walküren, from "Die Walküre."

Mr. Ffrangçon Davies was the singer.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony was played superbly and less well by fits and starts. The performance of the first movement was admirable indeed; a finer and more sympathetic reading, one that perceived more clearly by reading between the lines all that the composer carelessly omitted to indicate, were hard to imagine. What might be called Mendelssohn's stage directions in this movement are peculiarly misleading, and nothing short of nonsense would result from following them out to the letter. After putting the marking "Assai animato" over the first subsidiary, he forgot to indicate a return to the original tempo, which return is evidently necessary. Mr. Paur very rightly took the two markings, "Allegro un poco agitato" and "Assai animato," as applying to the particular themes against which they stand, not as holding good until countermanded. The result was that every measure in the movement was given its proper character. The playing by the orchestra was as fine as the conductor's reading.

The second movement, on the other hand, struck us as not being read well, as it certainly was not well played. Mr. Paur took it frankly Vivace, not heeding the modifying "non troppo;" the theme thus lost all its jauntiness, and the working-out became a mere scramble. The orchestra, too, was at odds with itself, and seemed to be trying to play in two different tempi at once. The Adagio went smoothly, but seemed to us to be even more sentimentalized than needful; each successive return of the principal theme seemed to fall back into an incredibly slow pace. But the finale was superbly played.

The symphony itself struck us more than ever as being a strangely unequal work. The second movement has generally been considered the gem of the whole, as it is surely one of the finest and most brilliant strokes of genius that ever came from Mendelssohn's pen. The first movement shows such freshness of invention and is, moveover, so impeccable in form, development and style that nothing can be urged against it save on the ground of personal taste. Perfect as it is, we must own to not liking it particularly; it does not seem to us to show Mendelssohn in his strongest vein; we find it somehow weaker than the lighter first movement of the "Italian" symphony. The finale has seldom come in for very hearty praise; in fact, it has commonly been deemed the weakest movement of the symphony. The concluding Allegro maestoso assai is poor and weak enough in all conscience; but last Saturday evening the main body of the movement seemed to us full of life and poetry. We found in it Mendelssohn in his best vein, the Mendelssohn of the "Walpurgisnacht," not the far weaker Mendelssohn of the "Lobgesang"—whom one recognizes plainly enough in the over-sentimental Adagio.

When first we heard Mr. Loeffler's "Tintagiles" we earnestly advocated the work's being given again; now the wished-for second performance has come, and brought far better understanding with it. This may be partly owing to some changes made in the score. An ordinary bass-clarinet now takes the place of the contrabass-clarinet, and with excellent effect. The portentous instrument used at the first performance had too much of the double-bass character to stand well alone; with all its undeniable beauty of tone, one felt the need of its being doubled in the upper octave; the part now sounds to perfection on the bass-clarinet. Then Mr. Loeffler has added a small E-flat clarinet to his wood-wind group; and this single little instrument makes all the difference between the lightning-flashes in the score being audible or inaudible; it puts an edge upon all those fiery runs!

Partly owing to these improvements in the score, but mainly by dint of the renewed hearing, we have now come to what seems to us an understanding of the work. We begin to find sense in all those cross-relations, and they no longer scorch our ear as they did. The melodic essence of the music has become plain to our perception, and we find it full of beauty and emotional poetry. We still feel a little unkindly towards the two violes d'amour; not so much because their subdued sweetness of tone soon becomes monotonous—though this is unquestionably a disadvantage—as from our general objection to the prolonged use of solo stringed instruments in connection with the ultra-modern orchestra. These violes d'amour are not physically strong enough to act as the sole bearers of a musical idea in such an orchestral milieu as Mr. Loeffler's score; the effort to hear them is too great, and, of itself, distracts one's attention from the music; it is like listening to a feeble-voiced orator through the hubbub of a crowd; what he says carries no conviction with it. Here, as nearly always, the following-out of a preconceived scheme, instead of the spontaneous development of an artistic inspiration, brings its own punishment with it. Mr. Loeffler wanted to write something for two violes d'amour; and a desire of this sort is never in itself an inspiration. Carrying out this wish has here resulted in the composer's getting a sort of Procrustes bed, to which his musical inspiration must forcibly be made to fit—considerably to the detriment of the latter. If Mr. Loeffler had got his inspiration first, and then found that it called for two violes d'amour, and nothing else, that would have been a different matter. But, with this exception, we find the "Tintagiles" a work of very striking beauty, force and poetic imaginativeness. We may not quite sympathise with the composer's general scheme

French use of the brass whenever a phrase is to be made prominent in fortissimo, with that perpetually having recourse to unusual percussion timbres to mark strong accents; but this is a matter of taste, and who shall say that Mr. Loeffler's scoring does not exactly fit his musical thought? We are doubtless still somewhat out of Mr. Loeffler's musical atmosphere, and find it rather exotic, as making the process of breathing a too conscious one. But, with and in spite of all this, we feel that the "Tintagiles" marks distinctly another stage in the brilliant and almost constantly upward course he is running as a composer. The performance was superb.

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrior" was played as if both conductor and orchestra had mistaken the walls of the Music Hall for those of Jericho. No, Wagner was not the coarse roisterer that such playing seems to try to make him out to have been.

Whether Mr. Ffrangçon Davies was suffering from a cold or not, we do not know. All we do know is that we could hardly hear him at all. The orchestra treated him unkindly in both his selections. We thought now and then to catch some finely-meant declamatory singing on his part; but we cannot be quite sure of it. The song from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" struck us as about as near to nothing at all as anything we have heard for some time.

The next programme—for April 1 and 2 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Haydn, symphony No. 2, in D major; Mozart, Symphony No. 49, in C major, "Jupiter;" Beethoven, symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1898

Mr. F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sent us from Philadelphia the following flattering tribute which appeared in a recent issue of the Telegraph of that city: "Another season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has closed, and from all accounts it was the most successful of the thirteen series of the orchestra in Philadelphia. The fifth and final concert was given at the Academy of Music last night. The scenes were of the usual pleasantly exciting kind, the crowd as great as ever, but with all the enjoyment there was a note of regret through the fact that our main reliance of the winter and spring was removed. The concluding round of applause was not so much for the music as it was a personal tribute to Director Paur and a note of farewell. The concluding programme was fully worthy of the occasion. It was in two divisions, the first consisting of Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony and the second of a noble group of Wagnerian selections. It is safe to say that the symphony never had a finer rendition in Philadelphia. It was a wonderful demonstration of the highest orchestral art. Beyond everything else, it seemed to us, was the exquisite horn playing in the trio of the Scherzo—but it was all perfect. The Wagner pieces covered a great range, from the early 'Rienzi' to the late 'Tristan.' So varied were they that there was not the least sense of satiety. Perhaps the most wholly satisfying number was the 'Siegfried Idyll.' This work 'wears' astonishingly. It was not one of Wagner's ambitious, or even to say public undertakings, having been written for a home occasion, and in the first instance for a handful of instruments. Its history is quite like that of Mendelssohn's 'Son and Stranger.' But the 'Siegfried Idyll' was an inspiration, and has taken unmistakable rank among Wagner's leading works. May good luck attend Director Paur and his men and bring them our way another year!"

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1898.

The program of the eighteenth Symphony concert, March 19, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Scotch......Mendelssohn
Sir Brian's Song, Woo Thou Thy Snowflake, from Ivanhoe..............................Sulivan
The Death of Tintagiles (suggested by the drama of Maurice Maeterlinck), Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour obligate ....Loeffler
(The violas d'amour by Franz Kneisel and C. M. Loeffler.
Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Charm, from The Walküre .... Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries, from The Walküre....Wagner

This concert does not call for extended comment. Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem gained by a second hearing. The greater part of it is highly imaginative, extraordinary in harmonic treatment and in orchestration. I still think that the work would be improved if the violas d'amour had less to do; for their very sweetness soon distresses and vexes the ear.

The symphony was finely played. To me there is little or no interest in the work after the scherzo, and the first movement is by far the best of the four. I kept thinking last night of poor Aubrey Beardsley's caricature of Mendelssohn, which was published in the Savoy. And I heard Mendelssohn saying: "What a fine Scotch mist this is! It will not last long. Come under my silk umbrella. See, it has an ivory handle."

Ffrangcon-Davies sang with beauty of tone and vocal skill the wretched twaddle from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," a song that has zoölogical interest, however, as you will see by this verse:

> And I will woo her as the lion woos,
> To bring his wild mate docile to his side;
> And I will win her as the lion wins,
> That in the desert leads his tawny bride.

The lion and the lioness are not so conventional.

Mr. Davies was overweighted by Wotan's music.

Mr. Apthorp, in the program-book, plumed himself on the plural (in English) "Valkyior," for the singular "Valkyr."

PHILIP HALE.

---

25 HUNTINGTON AVENUE,
BOSTON, March 21, 1898.

MUSIC HALL has been sold and will eventually be demolished, thereby removing from Boston a building whose history is rather unique, bearing as it does the title of "Music Hall." It was originally built as a temple of music, and for large gatherings such as grand concerts, Handel and Haydn meetings and so on. But within the period which covers the history of our Symphony concerts, scarcely have the strains of a Brahms concerto died away before the wail of the first entry to the prize baby show might have been heard—or the dull thuds of the hammer, at work removing the seats preparatory to arranging the hall for a grand prize fight. The lusty crow of the best breed of barnyard fowl has been heard on the same spot where the divine Patti swayed a multitude. But what of that? The really great events have outnumbered these money making schemes that were tolerated to keep up the percentage on the investment, and we reluctantly relinquish a place so redolent of events historical, instructive and interesting. Music Hall was dedicated on Saturday evening, November 20, 1852, by a grand concert comprising the following selections and artists:

PART I.

Overture, "Zauberfloete"..........................Mozart
Musical Fund Society.
Chorus, Hallelujah, from "Mount of Olives"...Beethoven
Handel and Haydn Society.
Song, "Casta Diva"...................................Bellini
Madame Alboni.
German Part Songs—
"Nachlied" .... Lenz
"Der Jaeger Abschied"...............Mendelssohn
Kreissman's German Liederkranz.
Polonaise Concertante, "Gruss an das Vaterland"
Composed for orchestra by Wittmann.
Arranged for brass music by G. Schnapp.
Germania Serenade Band.
Canzone, Ciascum la dice, from "La Fille du Regiment".. Donizetti
Madame Alboni.
Chorus, "The Heavens Are Telling," from "The Creation" .... Haydn
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

PART II.

Overture, "Oberon"............................ Weber
Musical Fund Society.
Selection from the Oratorio of "St. Paul....Mendelssohn
Mr. Arthurson.
Musical Education Society.
Trio, "Ah Quel Colpa," from "Il Barbiere"......Rossini
Madame Alboni, Signor Sangiovanni and Signor Rovere.
Andante from Fifth Symphony..............Beethoven
Musical Fund Society.
Rondo Finale, "Non Piu Mesta," from "Cenerentola" .... Rossini
Madame Alboni.
Hallelujah Chorus, from the "Messiah"..........Händel
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

Sunday morning following, the Rev. Thomas Parker preached, and in the forty-five years that have intervened since that memorable week, nearly every great celebrity of music or the lecture platform have appeared on the stage of Music Hall. The great organ, since removed to make room for the Symphony players, was dedicated on the night of November 2, 1863, with a memorable program. Charlotte Cushman read an ode to the organ. John K. Paine played selections from Bach, and B. J. Lang, then the organist of "Old South Church," played a Mendelssohn Sonata and the Handel and Hayden Society sang.

The three hundredth birthday of Shakespeare was celebrated on April 23, 1864. April 16, 1865, a grand choral performance marked the close of the Civil War. The Handel and Haydn Society sang a dirge from "Judas Maccabeus" at the memorial service for the martyred President Lincoln on June 1, 1865.

On July 4, 1865, the eighty-ninth year of our independence was celebrated there. The first symphony concert was given by the Harvard Musical Association in 1865, under the directorship of Carl Zerrahn.

P. T. Barnum lectured there on "The World, and How to Live In It." A testimonial concert was also given to Ole Bull.

The one hundredth anniversary of the evacuation of Boston was celebrated on March 17, 1876, and on this occasion such men as Henry W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Oliver Ditson and Edward Everett Hale lent their assistance.

Great singers from Sontag, Alboni, Jenny Lind, Christine Nilsson, Patti, Mme. Parepa and Anna Louise Cary to the present sta· Melba and others, have thrilled great audiences there.

The present Boston Symphony Orchestra, founded by Henry G. Higginson, first appeared there in 1881 under the baton of Georg Henschel, and for seventeen years it has been the home of that skilled organization.

Many fears have been expressed at the news of the sale of the building, lest the orchestra should have no home; but it is said that the sale was made on conditions that the orchestra could remain two years longer. As a lot has been purchased and a fund of $200,000 subscribed for a new Music Hall, we hope little time will be lost in getting to work on the new "Temple of Art."

Upon what basis this new building will be erected there is much conjecturing. Few, if any of us, wish to see a new Music Hall built to be desecrated by the class of performances permitted in the old hall. Someone has suggested a well appointed Opera House, restricted to musical performances only; and in conjunction with its being a home for the Symphony Orchestra, make it also the home of permanent opera, serving as an outlet for the educational institutions of music of our city. However it may end, let us hope procrastination will not steal the two years limit on the old Music Hall and find us with no suitable place to hold our choral and symphony concerts.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the concert in the Metropolitan Opera House Thursday evening, March 24, this program will be given:

The three instrumental movements from the Ninth Symphony, in D minor, op. 125..........Beethoven
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72..........Beethoven
Overture, Rienzi..Wagner
Idyll, Siegfried...Wagner
Prelude, act III., Lohengrin..........................Wagner
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death, Tristan and Isolde..Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries, Act III, Die Walküre.....Wagner

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 21, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The nineteenth symphony concert brought the following programme:

Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A Minor, "Scotch," opus 56.
Sullivan: Sir Brian's Song, "Woo thou thy snowflake," from "Ivanhoe."
(First time in Boston.)
Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles" (suggested by the Drama by Maurice Maeterlinck), for Orchestra and two Violes d'Amour obbligate (MS.)
Wagner: Wotans Abschied and Feuerzauber, from "Die Walküre."
Wagner: Der Ritt der Walküren, from "Die Walküre."

Mr. Ffrangcon Davies was the singer.

Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony was played superbly and less well by fits and starts. The performance of the first movement was admirable indeed; a finer and more sympathetic reading, one that perceived more clearly by reading between the lines all that the composer carelessly omitted to indicate, were hard to imagine. What might be called Mendelssohn's stage directions in this movement are peculiarly misleading, and nothing short of nonsense would result from following them out to the letter. After putting the marking "Assai animato" over the first subsidiary, he forgot to indicate a return to the original tempo, which return is evidently necessary. Mr. Paur very rightly took the two markings, "Allegro un poco agitato" and "Assai animato," as applying to the particular themes against which they stand, not as holding good until countermanded. The result was that every measure in the movement was given its proper character. The playing by the orchestra was as fine as the conductor's reading.

The second movement, on the other hand, struck us as not being read well, as it certainly was not well played. Mr. Paur took it frankly Vivace, not heeding the modifying "non troppo;" the theme thus lost all its jauntiness, and the working-out became a mere scramble. The orchestra, too, was at odds with itself, and seemed to be trying to play in two different tempi at once. The Adagio went smoothly, but seemed to us to be even more sentimentalized than needful; each successive return of the principal theme seemed to fall back into an incredibly slow pace. But the finale was superbly played.

The symphony itself struck us more than ever as being a strangely unequal work. The second movement has generally been considered the gem of the whole, as it is surely one of the finest and most brilliant strokes of genius that ever came from Mendelssohn's pen. The first movement shows such freshness of invention and is, moveover, so impeccable in form, development and style that nothing can be urged against it save on the ground of personal taste. Perfect as it is, we must own to not liking it particularly; it does not seem to us to show Mendelssohn in his strongest vein; we find it somehow weaker than the lighter first movement of the "Italian" symphony. The finale has seldom come in for very hearty praise; in fact, it has commonly been deemed the weakest movement of the symphony. The concluding Allegro maestoso assai is poor and weak enough in all conscience; but last Saturday evening the main body of the movement seemed to us full of life and poetry. We found in it Mendelssohn in his best vein, the Mendelssohn of the "Walpurgisnacht," not the far weaker Mendelssohn of the "Lobgesang"—whom one recognizes plainly enough in the over-sentimental Adagio.

When first we heard Mr. Loeffler's "Tintagiles" we earnestly advocated the work's being given again; now the wished-for second performance has come, and brought far better understanding with it. This may be partly owing to some changes made in the score. An ordinary bass-clarinet now takes the place of the contrabass-clarinet, and with excellent effect. The portentous instrument used at the first performance had too much of the double-bass character to stand well alone; with all its undeniable beauty of tone, one felt the need of its being doubled in the upper octave; the part now sounds to perfection on the bass-clarinet. Then Mr. Loeffler has added a small E-flat clarinet to his wood-wind group; and this single little instrument makes all the difference between the lightning-flashes in the score being audible or inaudible; it puts an edge upon all those fiery runs!

Partly owing to these improvements in the score, but mainly by dint of the renewed hearing, we have now come to what seems to us an understanding of the work. We begin to find sense in all those cross-relations, and they no longer scorch our ear as they did. The melodic essence of the music has become plain to our perception, and we find it full of beauty and emotional poetry. We still feel a little unkindly towards the two violes d'amour; not so much because their subdued sweetness of tone soon becomes monotonous—though this is unquestionably a disadvantage—as from our general objection to the prolonged use of solo stringed instruments in connection with the ultra-modern orchestra. These violes d'amour are not physically strong enough to act as the sole bearers of a musical idea in such an orchestral milieu as Mr. Loeffler's score; the effort to hear them is too great, and, of itself, distracts one's attention from the music; it is like listening to a feeble-voiced orator through the hubbub of a crowd; what he says carries no conviction with it. Here, as nearly always, the following-out of a preconceived scheme, instead of the spontaneous development of an artistic inspiration, brings its own punishment with it. Mr. Loeffler wanted to write something for two violes d'amour; and a desire of this sort is never in itself an inspiration. Carrying out this wish has here resulted in the composer's getting a sort of Procrustes bed, to which his musical inspiration must forcibly be made to fit—considerably to the detriment of the latter. If Mr. Loeffler had got his inspiration first, and then found that it called for two violes d'amour, and nothing else, that would have been a different matter. But, with this exception, we find the "Tintagiles" a work of very striking beauty, force and poetic imaginativeness. We may not quite sympathize with the composer's general scheme of orchestration, with that ultra-modern French use of the brass whenever a phrase is to be made prominent in fortissimo, with that perpetually having recourse to unusual percussion timbres to mark strong accents; but this is a matter of taste, and who shall say that Mr. Loeffler's scoring does not exactly fit his musical thought? We are doubtless still somewhat out of Mr. Loeffler's musical atmosphere, and find it rather exotic, as making the process of breathing a too conscious one. But, with and in spite of all this, we feel that the "Tintagiles" marks distinctly another stage in the brilliant and almost constantly upward course he is running as a composer. The performance was superb.

Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyrior" was played as if both conductor and orchestra had mistaken the walls of the Music Hall for those of Jericho. No, Wagner was not the coarse roisterer that such playing seems to try to make him out to have been.

Whether Mr. Ffrangcon Davies was suffering from a cold or not, we do not know. All we do know is that we could hardly hear him at all. The orchestra treated him unkindly in both his selections. We thought now and then to catch some finely-meant declamatory singing on his part; but we cannot be quite sure of it. The song from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe" struck us as about as near to nothing at all as anything we have heard for some time.

The next programme—for April 1 and 2 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Haydn, symphony No. 2, in D major; Mozart, Symphony No. 49, in C major, "Jupiter;" Beethoven, symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1898

Mr. F. R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has sent us from Philadelphia the following flattering tribute which appeared in a recent issue of the Telegraph of that city: "Another season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has closed, and from all accounts it was the most successful of the thirteen series of the orchestra in Philadelphia. The fifth and final concert was given at the Academy of Music last night. The scenes were of the usual pleasantly exciting kind, the crowd as great as ever, but with all the enjoyment there was a note of regret through the fact that our main reliance of the winter and spring was removed. The concluding round of applause was not so much for the music as it was a personal tribute to Director Paur and a note of farewell. The concluding programme was fully worthy of the occasion. It was in two divisions, the first consisting of Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony and the second of a noble group of Wagnerian selections. It is safe to say that the symphony never had a finer rendition in Philadelphia. It was a wonderful demonstration of the highest orchestral art. Beyond everything else, it seemed to us, was the exquisite horn playing in the trio of the Scherzo—but it was all perfect. The Wagner pieces covered a great range, from the early 'Rienzi' to the late 'Tristan.' So varied were they that there was not the least sense of satiety. Perhaps the most wholly satisfying number was the 'Siegfried Idyll.' This work 'wears' astonishingly. It was not one of Wagner's ambitious, or even to say public undertakings, having been written for a home occasion, and in the first instance for a handful of instruments. Its history is quite like that of Mendelssohn's 'Son and Stranger.' But the 'Siegfried Idyll' was an inspiration, and has taken unmistakable rank among Wagner's leading works. May good luck attend Director Paur and his men and bring them our way another year!"

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1898.

The program of the eighteenth Symphony concert, March 19, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Scotch......Mendelssohn
Sir Brian's Song, Woo Thou Thy Snowflake, from Ivanhoe..............................Sulivan
The Death of Tintagiles (suggested by the drama of Maurice Maeterlinck), Symphonic Poem for orchestra and two violas d'amour obligate ....Loeffler
(The violas d'amour by Franz Kneisel and C. M. Loeffler.
Wotan's Farewell and Fire-Charm, from The Walküre ....Wagner
The Ride of the Valkyries, from The Walküre....Wagner

This concert does not call for extended comment. Mr. Loeffler's symphonic poem gained by a second hearing. The greater part of it is highly imaginative, extraordinary in harmonic treatment and in orchestration. I still think that the work would be improved if the violas d'amour had less to do; for their very sweetness soon distresses and vexes the ear.

The symphony was finely played. To me there is little or no interest in the work after the scherzo, and the first movement is by far the best of the four. I kept thinking last night of poor Aubrey Beardsley's caricature of Mendelssohn, which was published in the Savoy. And I heard Mendelssohn saying: "What a fine Scotch mist this is! It will not last long. Come under my silk umbrella. See, it has an ivory handle."

Ffrangcon-Davies sang with beauty of tone and vocal skill the wretched twaddle from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," a song that has zoölogical interest, however, as you will see by this verse:

> And I will woo her as the lion woos,
> To bring his wild mate docile to his side;
> And I will win her as the lion wins,
> That in the desert leads his tawny bride.

The lion and the lioness are not so conventional.

Mr. Davies was overweighted by Wotan's music.

Mr. Apthorp, in the program-book, plumed himself on the plural (in English) "Valkyior," for the singular "Valkyr."

PHILIP HALE.

25 HUNTINGTON AVENUE,
BOSTON, March 21, 1898.

MUSIC HALL has been sold and will eventually be demolished, thereby removing from Boston a building whose history is rather unique, bearing as it does the title of "Music Hall." It was originally built as a temple of music, and for large gatherings such as grand concerts, Handel and Haydn meetings and so on. But within the period which covers the history of our Symphony concerts, scarcely have the strains of a Brahms concerto died away before the wail of the first entry to the prize baby show might have been heard—or the dull thuds of the hammer, at work removing the seats preparatory to arranging the hall for a grand prize fight. The lusty crow of the best breed of barnyard fowl has been heard on the same spot where the divine Patti swayed a multitude. But what of that? The really great events have outnumbered these money making schemes that were tolerated to keep up the percentage on the investment, and we reluctantly relinquish a place so redolent of events historical, instructive and interesting. Music Hall was dedicated on Saturday evening, November 20, 1852, by a grand concert comprising the following selections and artists:

PART I.

Overture, "Zauberfloete"..............................Mozart
Musical Fund Society.
Chorus, Hallelujah, from "Mount of Olives"...Beethoven
Handel and Haydn Society.
Song, "Casta Diva"..............................Bellini
Madame Alboni.
German Part Songs—
"Nachlied"..............................Lenz
"Der Jaeger Abschied"..............Mendelssohn
Kreissman's German Liederkranz.
Polonaise Concertante, "Gruss an das Vaterland"
Composed for orchestra by Wittmann.
Arranged for brass music by G. Schnapp.
Germania Serenade Band.
Canzone, Ciascum la dice, from "La Fille du Regiment"..............................Donizetti
Madame Alboni.
Chorus, "The Heavens Are Telling," from "The Creation"..............................Haydn
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

PART II.

Overture, "Oberon"..............................Weber
Musical Fund Society.
Selection from the Oratorio of "St. Paul....Mendelssohn
Mr. Arthurson.
Musical Education Society.
Trio, "Ah Quel Colpa," from "Il Barbiere"......Rossini
Madame Alboni, Signor Sangiovanni and Signor Rovere.
Andante from Fifth Symphony..............Beethoven
Musical Fund Society.
Rondo Finale, "Non Piu Mesta," from "Cenerentola" ....Rossini
Madame Alboni.
Hallelujah Chorus, from the "Messiah".........Händel
Handel and Haydn and Musical Education Societies.

Sunday morning following, the Rev. Thomas Parker preached, and in the forty-five years that have intervened since that memorable week, nearly every great celebrity of music or the lecture platform have appeared on the stage of Music Hall. The great organ, since removed to make room for the Symphony players, was dedicated on the night of November 2, 1863, with a memorable program. Charlotte Cushman read an ode to the organ. John K. Paine played selections from Bach, and B. J. Lang, then the organist of "Old South Church," played a Mendelssohn Sonata and the Handel and Hayden Society sang.

The three hundredth birthday of Shakespeare was celebrated on April 23, 1864. April 16, 1865, a grand choral performance marked the close of the Civil War. The Handel and Haydn Society sang a dirge from "Judas Maccabeus" at the memorial service for the martyred President Lincoln on June 1, 1865.

On July 4, 1865, the eighty-ninth year of our independence was celebrated there. The first symphony concert was given by the Harvard Musical Association in 1865, under the directorship of Carl Zerrahn.

P. T. Barnum lectured there on "The World, and How to Live In It." A testimonial concert was also given to Ole Bull.

The one hundredth anniversary of the evacuation of Boston was celebrated on March 17, 1876, and on this occasion such men as Henry W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Oliver Ditson and Edward Everett Hale lent their assistance.

Great singers from Sontag, Alboni, Jenny Lind, Christine Nilsson, Patti, Mme. Parepa and Anna Louise Cary to the present star Melba and others, have thrilled great audiences there.

The present Boston Symphony Orchestra, founded by Henry G. Higginson, first appeared there in 1881 under the baton of Georg Henschel, and for seventeen years it has been the home of that skilled organization.

Many fears have been expressed at the news of the sale of the building, lest the orchestra should have no home; but it is said that the sale was made on conditions that the orchestra could remain two years longer. As a lot has been purchased and a fund of $200,000 subscribed for a new Music Hall, we hope little time will be lost in getting to work on the new "Temple of Art."

Upon what basis this new building will be erected there is much conjecturing. Few, if any of us, wish to see a new Music Hall built to be desecrated by the class of performances permitted in the old hall. Someone has suggested a well appointed Opera House, restricted to musical performances only: and in conjunction with its being a home for the Symphony Orchestra, make it also the home of permanent opera, serving as an outlet for the educational institutions of music of our city. However it may end, let us hope procrastination will not steal the two years limit on the old Music Hall and find us with no suitable place to hold our choral and symphony concerts.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the concert in the Metropolitan Opera House Thursday evening, March 24, this program will be given:

The three instrumental movements from the Ninth Symphony, in D minor, op. 125..........Beethoven
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72..........Beethoven
Overture, Rienzi..............................Wagner
Idyll, Siegfried..............................Wagner
Prelude, act III., Lohengrin..................Wagner
Prelude and Isolde's Love Death, Tristan and Isolde..............................Wagner
Ride of the Valkyries, Act III, Die Walküre.....Wagner

The Evening Telegram.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1898.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

NEW YORK last night paid highest compliment to Boston's symphony organization. Without a great soloist as a special attraction, Mr. Emil Paur and his men brought music lovers to the Metropolitan in such numbers as to fill the house. The audience, as a whole, I think, was thankful that there was no soloist. An orchestral performance straight through, of the high degree of excellence that has made the Boston organization famous, was wanted. The work last night was far from being absolutely flawless, but its artistic merits more than overbalanced its shortcomings. It was a Beethoven and Wagner programme. There were the three movements from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which were heard Saturday afternoon at the last Thomas concert. While the symphony was given a dramatic reading, repose was lacking. The second movement (molto vivace presto) was bubbling over with life, but the daintiness that was required at times was missing. While worldly joy and contentment are intended to be portrayed in this movement, it was wildly boisterous as given last night. Ordinary worldly joy and contentment were not enough. It was as though they had been exaggerated by imbibings of spirituous mixtures. The brass and the drums were too prominent. That fine balance that we always look for in the Boston Symphony Orchestra was not there. Perhaps this uneven exuberance was due to joy among the orchestra members at the thought of winding up their season and getting back to the bean pots. The same criticism that is made on the rendering of the Second Symphony movement holds with the performance of "The Ride of the Walkyries." Here the strings were scarcely audible because of the overbalancing brasses. In the third movement of the symphony the celestially soothing tones were effectively brought out. There was not as much precision at times as could have been desired. The "Rienzi" overture was given a fiery and dramatic reading. All the themes were given their proper value. The strings, in particular, were rich and full. "Lohengrin's" prelude, act II., had a brilliant interpretation and was rendered with great verve. The tempo was rushed and this interfered with the poetry and dignity. One of the best readings Mr. Paur has given us this season was his interpretation of the Siegfried idyl. All the motives were brought out with beautiful distinctness. The climax was most effective.

The Press

TUESDAY, MARCH 22, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last of the Series of '97-'98—Beethoven and Wagner.

At the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of '97-'98, at the Academy of Music last evening, Conductor Paur had a double opportunity to displease those who are not wedded to his ways, and he made full use of his chances. The dividing of the programme between the Heroic Symphony and Wagner selections was not particularly happy to begin with, and it was made less happy, since one passed from the affectations that mark the conductor's interpretation of Beethoven, to the affectations that mar his reading of Wagner. Even with this it is true the orchestra, owing to its excellence, gives great pleasure, and that many of the readings of Mr. Paur are open to argument, in which he might easily win. Yet, after all allowance is made for the conductor's view of things, it is clear a reading that impresses the auditor as finicky, is hardly what one might hope for. And this was the impression made in the reading of the symphony last night, not only in the first movement, but in the second, the latter coming in for a certain halting effect that suggested a deliberation that defeated its own ends.

In the Wagner selections Mr. Paur's ideas of ultra refinement led him to what might be called concertizing effects. There is an almost inaudible pianissimo, for instance, and changes in tempo that are somewhat surprising in certain passages. With this a lack of accentuation leaves one in doubt as to the thematic groundwork at times, and while this method is capable of fine results, it cannot on the whole be considered entirely satisfactory.

The World

hed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PA
New York.

FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1898.

SUPERB ORCHESTRAL PLAYING.

Boston Symphony Musicians Give Their Last Concert at the Opera-House.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert at the Metropolitan Opera-House last evening. The patronage during the season has been gratifyingly large. Its growth has been slow. There were years when the attendance was so small that the well-wishers of this master organization despaired, but perseverance has had its reward. The music-lovers of New York have finally realized that this orchestra stands in a class by itself in this country, and is the peer of the five or six great bands of the Old World. It may be safe to predict that the number of concerts will be increased next season.

Mr. Paur and his musicians seemed determined last evening to make their farewell a brilliant one. The orchestra has never so fully established its supremacy. It displayed all of its extraordinary virtuosity, and it did more—it gave cumulative proof of its higher artistic qualities as the interpreter of the great works in the literature of music.

Mr. Paur was a transformed maestro. His readings were broad, virile, free, vibrant with emotional life; they had none of the bigotry of tradition, the timid adherence to inflexible methods, which once marked and marred his work. The Paur of 1898 is a very different man from the Paur of 1893. His predecessors made the orchestra; the orchestra has made him. He has shaken off his provincialism and his better musical nature has come to the surface. His success last night was an artistic redemption.

That this orchestra should have won its final victory with a programme which was one-half Wagner was all the more remarkable. For obvious reasons, New York is wise in its judgment on Wagnerian interpretations. It has never heard better ones than those given last evening—notably of the "Lohengrin" prelude (act third), the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Ride of the Valkyries." The fulness of tone, the working up of the climaxes, the rush of the tempi, the accentuations and the emphases, the consistency of rhythmic figures—all the factors which combine in the irresistible force and the majority of Wagner's proclamations were there.

Even in the Beethoven number—the first three movements of the Ninth Symphony and the "Leonore" overture No. 3—Mr. Paur seemed like a new man. The second movement of the Symphony was a masterpiece of clean-cut, finished playing; the melodic theme—the first of the last movement, deep, emotional, pathetic—was beautifully sung by the first violins. In the overture, the celebrated passage for the strings was a triumph of technical precision.

Mr. Paur may not be in his present position next year. If he has made his last appearance in New York, he has said "good-bye" like a great artist.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1898.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Paur and his men were in fine fittle last night, and their last concert at the Metropolitan Opera House was memorable for the music played and the manner of the performance. The programme was evenly divided between Beethoven and Wagner, the former being represented by the three inistrumental movements from the ninth symphony and the third "Leonore" overture, the latter by the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried Idyl," prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Ride of the Valkyrior," from "Die Walküre." It was a somewhat too generous scheme, but our visitors were ividently determined to make an impression that would last through the music-barren summer months, and they certainly did it. With the Scherzo of the symphony Mr. Paur carried the audience (a remarkably fine and numerous one, by the way) completely off its feet, figuratively speaking. A more dashing performance could scarcely be perceived, though we fancy Beethoven would have been startled by the tempo, which was so invariably rapid, especially in the Trio, as to defeat some of the composer's gracious purposes. In the propositional or expository part of the first movement he could also have wished greater deliberation and elasticity, but the illustrative portion was superb in its clearness and brilliancy. The Wagner numbers have figured before on the programmes which Mr. Paur has devoted to that composer, but he has never given them with greater effect. Even the somewhat tawdry overture to "Rienzi" was made positively uplifting, and if the audience had had its way the "Lohengrin" music would have been repeated.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the final concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which occurred at the Metropolitan Opera House last evening, Mr. Paur presented a programme which consisted exclusively of compositions of Beethoven and Wagner. Fine names, these—indeed, none greater in the world of music. And yet the programme was open to criticism.

The ninth symphony without the final movement, though not precisely like Hamlet without Hamlet, is not unlike that play with the fourth act omitted. The "Rienzi" overture, too, could easily have been spared. It is a fine out of door composition at the best. Nor is the "Ride of the Valkyries" any longer an appropriate selection for concert purposes.

The orchestra was at its best in the third "Leonore" overture and in the "Tristan" music. In the latter the volume and beauty of tone were indeed quite overpowering. In the Siegfried Idyl, however, a smaller orchestra makes a much finer effect.

The New York Times

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1898.

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season took place last night at the Metropolitan Opera House. In spite of the fact that no soloist was announced, the audience was one of the largest of the season, and its enthusiasm was unmistakable. The simple statement of this fact is a tribute to public taste in this town, for to admire such orchestral playing as that of the gentlemen from Boston is to prove that one is capable of recognizing the best work of this kind that can be heard in this country. Comparisons are always odious and they are not good criticism. But it is the habit of the New York public to wish to know what is the best and for that it is willing to pay liberally. If the opinion of The New York Times has any weight, it may be uttered frankly, and it is to the effect that the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to-day, as it has been for the past dozen years, the standard of excellence in orchestral performance in the United States. Those who are timid about forming absolute ideals as to what is best in orchestral playing will not go far astray if they hang their judgment on the work of this organization.

The programme last night was devoted to Beethoven and Wagner. The first was represented by three movements of his Ninth Symphony and his "Leonore" overture, No. 3. The second was represented by the overture to "Rienzi," the "Siegfried Idyl," the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," the vorspiel and "liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde," and "The Ride of the Valkyrs." Mr. Paur gave a most interesting and unconventional reading of the movements of the Ninth Symphony. He took the working-out part of the first movement rather slowly, but used the tempo to bring out in the clearest and most convincing manner every fragment of melodic significance in the various instrumental voices. It was a working-out in the fullest sense of the term. The scherzo Mr. Paur took too fast, but the orchestra passed the ordeal triumphantly. The slow movement was played with magnificent breadth and with most eloquent accentuation. That was, indeed, a noble performance, and was heard with breathless attention.

The tremendous vigor of Mr. Paur's reading of the "Rienzi" overture is well known here. The familiar number went finely last night. The "Siegfried Idyl" was perhaps a trifle hurried, but the "Lohengrin" excerpt was played most brilliantly, and the "Tristan" music was given with superb emotional effect. The "Ride of the Valkers" was a veritable tour de force and brought the concert to a stirring conclusion. We shall be happy, perchance, when we have a real permanent orchestra of our own, but in the mean time we need not want for great orchestral playing while the Boston organization exists and comes to gladden us with its glorious singing of masterworks.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, 1898.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's custom of giving a complete Wagner programme at the last of its New York concerts, was modified last night to the extent of introducing the first three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and the same composer's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. The other numbers were all Wagnerian, and comprised the "Rienzi" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll," the prelude to Act II. of "Lohengrin," the prelude and finale to "Tristan und Isolde," and the "Ride of the Valkyries." If the motive for the performance of the Beethoven symphony was to show how much better the Boston men could give it than the Chicago Orchestra did last Saturday, it was undoubtedly gratified. Seldom have New Yorkers heard a nobler reading of the three instrumental movements or witnessed more exalted exhibition of an orchestra's sympathy with a conductor's purposes. Most previous productions of the work paled before the enlightened vigor and admirable discrimination of the one that Mr. Emil Paur and his forces offered last night. The finely balanced instrumental choirs entered and withdrew from participation in the performance with the precision and unanimity of one man. The phrasing was of a sort that made Beethoven's meaning as plain as it ever has been in local concert rooms. The dignity and breadth of the first and third movements, especially, were made keenly evident. The great audience, which nearly filled the lower part of the Metropolitan Opera House, appreciated thoroughly what Mr. Paur offered.

In the Wegner numbers Mr. Paur was less satisfactory. He reached the highest level in his performance of the "Siegfried Idyll," in which delicacy of touch means so much. He and his men gave a letter-perfect reading of the "Tristan" music and rose valiantly to the double climax in the "Liebestod," yet it lacked the contrast which a little more reposefulness would have given and failed t[illegible] convince. The "Ride of the Valkyries," h[illegible]ever, was splendidly played.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, MARCH 25, 1898.

Last of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

At the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Society Mr. Paur gave not only a remarkable programme, but a remarkable interpretation. He seemed to fling the gauntlet down to Mr. Thomas and his organization by choosing three movements of Beethoven's ninth symphony and the third Leonore overture, the strains of which, as rendered by the Chicago Orchestra, are still ringing in our ears. And there is no doubt that Paur distanced Thomas immeasurably in the amount of beauty which he contrived to bring out of Beethoven's work. The sweetness and charm of tone that belong to the Boston orchestra have much to do with this fortunate result, but also to a great extent that extraordinary buoyancy which Paur contrives to put into every phase of Beethoven or Brahms or Schumann.

All of the Beethoven music was played to perfection last evening, and perhaps it was a comparison with true perfection that caused the interpretations of Wagner which followed to seem lacking in greater or less degree. It seems curious to have Beethoven, the stiff, conventional, even-paced classic, filled to overflowing with passionate fervor and a sort of seething, pent-up fire, and to have Wagner appearing before us in statuesque repose, serene, complacent, and almost deprecating in manner. Yet this was the case last evening. The Valkyrs and their horses were tame and orderly. Only Elsa and Lohengrin's wedded happiness was dashing or brilliant or unconstrained. Yet there was magnificent playing done throughout the whole performance, and the concert was one to be looked back upon as a joy forever.

The Boston orchestra has indeed more power of giving pleasure than any other, because it is an assemblage of most skilful performers, who possess fine instruments, and who have the inestimable advantages of constant practice and a talented leader.

TELEGRAPH—PHILADELPHIA

MARCH 22, 1898.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Another season of the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has closed, and from all accounts it was the most successful of the thirteen series of the orchestra in Philadelphia. The fifth and final concert was given at the Academy of Music last night. The scenes were of the usual pleasantly exciting kind, the crowd as great as ever, but with all the enjoyment there was a note of regret through the fact that our main reliance of the winter and spring was removed. The concluding round of applause was not so much for the music as it was a personal tribute to Director Paur and a note of farewell. The concluding programme was fully worthy of the occasion. It was in two divisions, the first consisting of Beethoven's "Erdica" Symphony and the second of a noble group of Wagnerian selections. It is safe to say that the symphony never had a finer rendition in Philadelphia. It was a wonderful demonstration of the highest orchestral art. Beyond everything else, it seemed to us, was the exquisite horn playing in the trio of the Scherzo—but it was all perfect. The Wagner pieces covered a great range, from the early "Rienzi" to the late "Tristan." So varied were they that there was not the least sense of satiety. Perhaps the most wholly satisfying number was the "Siegfried Idyll." This work "wears" astonishingly. It was not one of Wagner's ambitions, or even to say public undertakings, having been written for a home occasion and in the first instance for a handful of instruments. Its history is quite like that of Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger." But the "Siegfried Idyll" was an inspiration, and has taken unmistakable rank among Wagner's leading works. May good luck attend Director Paur and his men and bring them our way another year!

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 22, 1898.

Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra wound up its very successful season at the Academy of Music with a concert divided between Beethoven and Wagner. The third symphony, Eroica, was finely played, with delicacy of execution, if not always with the fullest effect, the spirit of the funeral march seeming to pervade other portions of the work. The second part of the programme illustrated the range of Wagner's genius, so far as possible in a concert, with great variety and beauty. It opened with the early overture to "Rienzi" and closed with the "Tannhauser" overture, and between these were the lovely "Siegfried Idyl"—the best piece of execution in the concert—and excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "Tristan and Isolde." The house was crowded and the manifestations of pleasure were pronounced, and Mr. Paur can look back on the closing concert of his Philadelphia season with peculiar gratification.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Infantry hall tomorrow night at 8 o'clock. Mr. George W. Proctor will be the soloist for the evening and the program includes Weber's Overture to "Der Freitschutz," Tschaikowsky's Concerto No. 1 for the pianoforte, and Schuman's Symphony No. 1.

PUBLIC [illegible]

Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 22, 1898.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Crowded House Listens to their Farewell Performance of the Season.

The fifth and last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday evening at the Academy of Music. In the arrangement of the programme there was a new and not altogether welcome departure.

The usual soloist was conspicuous by his absence and the whole of the evening following the intermission was devoted to Wagner, five selections in all being given from his works.

What prompted this course is not easy to understand. The orchestra which Mr. Paur has the honor of conducting is one that is pre-eminent in interpreting the words of Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn and some others, but broadly speaking Wagner is out of their line.

If there was ever any doubt upon this subject the playing of the idyll from "Siegfried" and the overture to "Tannhauser" last night should have dispelled it. Coming, too, so swiftly after the splendid Wagnerian work of the Thomas Orchestra, the weakness of their interpretation became more glaringly apparent.

In the idyll, what should have been the soft murmur of the woods and the liquid carol of the birds became a muffled, unmeaning chaos of sounds. Mr. Paur might rise to an Odyssey, but bucolics, apparently, are beneath him.

He was equally as indifferent in the stately measures which conclude the overture to "Tannhauser;" they seemed to possess no charm for him, or not enough, at any rate, to overcome his insatiable appetite for conquering technical difficulties.

He has no time to be stately, consequently the lofty tone of the music was lost in the racing of the violins and the sound and fury of the cymbals and drums.

It would have been far pleasanter, after the magnificent concerts which these admirable musicians have afforded this season, to have chronicled this last effort as their greatest and looked forward to next season with their sweetest strains ringing in our ears, but, for the sake of the future, it is best to be explicit, and next time when we have Wagner let us hope it may be in smaller doses.

There was, however, one important exception in the list of Wagnerian imperfections—the overture to Rienzi, though somewhat noisy at the close, was played with brilliancy and spirit. In such cases, where the hand rather than the heart should be the guide, the orchestra is never found wanting.

The first part of the evening—to speak of what was best last—was devoted to Beethoven's well known Eroica symphony (No. 3, in E flat major), a work that the orchestra have probably played together a great number of times; at any rate they played it as if they had, each separate movement was rendered in that scholarly manner which is the orchestra's greatest charm, and the playing of the whole symphony was as near perfect as possible.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - - MARCH 22, 1898

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Concert of the Season at the Academy Last Night

The fifth and last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was given at the Academy of Music last night, with the following program:

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica"	Beethoven
"Rienzi," overture	Wagner
"Siegfried," Idyll	Wagner
"Lohengrin," prelude Act III	Wagner
"Tristan and Isolde," prelude and Isolde's love death	Wagner
"Tannhauser," overture	Wagner

A program such as this does not offer much opportunity for extended criticism, as all of the Wagner numbers in it have been made familiar to concert and opera goers in one form or other. This does not, however, imply that the concert was not an enjoyable one, for it assuredly was from more than one standpoint. As for the Beethoven Symphony it cannot be said that the opening movement—allegro con brio—impresses. There is in it the suggestion of over-elaboration, and despite Mr. Apthorp's criticism in the printed program it is not Beethovenish. All the delicacy with which the strings were played, and the vigor which they bestowed upon the free fantasia could not impart soul to the passage work. The second movement—marcia funebre—begins to redeem the work and from that on to the furious rush of the finale, melodic surprises follow each other breathlessly and rapidly. It was in the coda that there could be noticed how the conductor succeeds in keeping his brass and woods down to a proper relation with the strings and gets such splendid results. The work was played with technical perfection, and the balance of the various parts was exquisite. Everything came out with delicious clearness, and yet nothing was forced.

The Wagner part of the program was unevenly given. The Rienzi overture had a magnificent interpretation bestowed upon it. The tone throughout was a marvel of purity and sonority and the closest attention was paid to musical "values." The long sustained A on the trumpet, which recalls the marvelous trumpet call in "Fidello" was given so artistically that it almost opened up a vista of the uprising of the people, while the theme of Rienzi's prayer, given by the violins and 'cello had an incomparable rendition. The "Siegfried" Idyll, with its pastoral glimpses, such as even "Papa" Haydn never furnished, was given with beautiful transparency and reposeful finish. But the Tristan music disappointed in the manner of its playing. Occasionally the tempo was disregarded, little attention was paid to phrasing and the climax was far from being effective. Yet all this was forgotten in listening to the "Tannhauser" overture. Mr. Paur's reading of it was the best ever given in this city, and it was a glorious finale to the concert and to the season.

Philadelphia, March 22, 1898.

Farewell Boston Symphony Concert.

Rubinstein once described Beethoven as "the musical reverberation of the French Revolution." Not, he hastened to add, of the guillotine, but of the drama itself—"in no wise history set to music, but the tragedy echoing in music which is called 'Liberty, Equality, Fraternity.'" It is impossible to listen to the great maestro's "Eroica" symphony, which was the opening number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert of the season at the Academy last evening, without recalling Rubinstein's remark; although, to be sure, the programme-makers have sometimes sought to read too much of Napoleonic significance into that massive composition. The only allusion to Napoleon in connection with this work that Beethoven is reported to have made after tearing off the dedicatory title page in disgust (on hearing of the coup d'etat) was when that once great colossus of Europe perished on the little isle of St. Helena. "I have already composed the proper music for that catastrophe," sententiously observed this gruff, uncouth giant of heavenly harmonies. As interpreted last night, with such superb magnificence of emotion in the strings, it is plain that the musical echoer of the revolution appreciated its great central hero, in spite of his crimes. The symphony was impressively rendered throughout, with that moderation of personal temperament which is happily developing in Herr Paur. But while this conductor is less extravagant and fantastical in his readings, he still takes considerable liberty with the tempi. The rest of the programme was devoted, as hitherto, to Wagner, the selections being admirably varied and interpreted with characteristic delightfulness.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, MARCH 22, 1898.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Closing Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and closing concert of a brilliantly successful season at the Academy of Music last night. As usual, the big house was crowded to the doors, and the occasion was one of great interest and enjoyment. Mr. Paur is not at his best as a conductor of Beethoven's music, and his rendering of the symphony, the great "Eroica," left something to be desired. It was very refined, and delicate, and pretty, but at no time did it sound the heroic note, and even the majestic funeral march had less than its proper impressiveness. It was all too sweet and smooth, too decorously restrained within the bounds of a fastidious dilettanteism, too wanting in elemental force and passion. The second part of the programme, consisting exclusively of Wagnerian selections, was the most satisfying. The playing of the "Rienzi" and "Tannhauser" overtures was superb, and nothing more could have been done with the "Siegfried" idyll or the "Lohengrin" intermezzo, or the "Tristan and Isolde" scena. As a conductor of Wagner's music, Mr. Paur is irreproachable.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1898.

At the last Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening the programme was made up entirely of Beethoven and Wagner. The orchestra was in brilliant form, and the three movements of the ninth symphony, with the third "Leonore" overture, were magnificently given. The tone color especially was beyond criticism. In the Wagner selections the orchestra never played with more dash and verve, more delicacy, finish, or warmth. It seemed as if Mr. Paur wished to thrown down the gauntlet to Thomas and Seidl. With the Boston Symphony orchestra Seidl would have made more of Wagner, perhaps, but certainly not of Beethoven. The "Leonore" overture has never been given more delightfully, and the crowded audience of the Metropolitan Opera House were enthusiastic over the rich feast provided them. Mr. Paur certainly conducts the finest orchestra in America.

AILY AND WEEKLY.

Providence, Rhode Island.

MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1898.

INFANTRY HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,

SEVENTH CONCERT,
WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 30,
AT 8 SHARP.

PROGRAMME:

Weber	Overture to "Der Freischutz"
Tscahikowsky	Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1
Schumann	Symphony No. 1

Soloist,
Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR.

Tickets on sale at INFANTRY HALL.

mch28-3t

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall is announced for next Wednesday evening, March 30. The program, although containing only three numbers, is a most attractive one, containing one most welcome novelty by a composer whose works have taken a most prominent part in concert programs throughout the world. It is both because of the great merit in his compositions, and on account of his comparatively recent and untimely death, that the name of Tschaikowsky is today one to conjure with, wherever the lovers of the best in music are assembled.

The program next Wednesday evening opens with Weber's well known overture to "Der Freischutz." The continued popularity of this overture is evidenced by its having been played in the concerts of this orchestra in Boston 20 times. The opera of "Der Freischutz" was first produced at the Court Opera in Berlin on June 18, 1820. The German word Freischutz means literally "free marksman" or in other words, a marksman who uses charmed bullets which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the aim and are therefore aptly termed "free." When Weber first completed the score of the opera the title was "The Huntsman's Betrothed," but it was first given under its present title.

The second number on the program is the Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1 by Tschaikowsky. This concerto was publicly played for the first time on any stage in the Boston Music Hall by Hans von Bulow, on Oct. 25, 1875, when the orchestra was conducted by Mr. B. J. Lang. The writer of the following interesting account was present at the performance which he describes: "This was probably the only time in the history of our city that an important work by a great, world famous composer had actually been brought out here. There was another 'first' connected with the history of this concerto; the first cablegram ever sent from Boston to Moscow was from von Bulow to Tschaikowsky, announcing the success of the work. The present writer was one of the small knot of musicians and music lovers present at the first rehearsal. None of us will ever forget the puissant impression made by the first few measures, the opening horn phrase, the crashing chords of the orchestra, and then that grand melody of the violins and 'cello. We had no idea of what von Bulow was playing, but soon came to the conclusion that here was something by a new man; questions were showered upon little Wertembheimer (von Bulow's business agent, as he passed through the hall. 'Tschaikowsky, Tschaikowsky,' was the hurriedly whispered reply, accompanied by looks full of important augury. Who Tschaikowsky was, few if any of us then knew; this outlandish name, which most of us even failed to catch, told us nothing. But before the rehearsal was over, it had become evident enough that this new Tschaikowsky was somebody."

This first performance was followed by others. Mr. Lang played it a year or two later at one of the old symphony concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and again at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on Feb. 21, 1885. The concerto will be played by Mr. George W. Proctor, who has recently returned from an extended sojourn abroad and has appeared with marked success at both the Boston and Cambridge concerts of the orchestra.

The closing number on the program is the Symphony No. 1 by Schumann, which was written in 1841 and first performed at a concert given by Clara Schumann, his wife, at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, by a strange coincidence, exactly 57 years ago. The work bears no descriptive title, although Schumann once said that while writing it he had spring in his mind and even once thought of calling it a "spring symphony." The score is dedicated to Friedrich August, King of Saxony.

THURSDAY, MARCH 31, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was the usual large audience, which had the pleasure of listening to one of the most brilliant concerts of the series, brilliant both in the character of the selections offered and the tremendous—one might almost say unusual—amount of energy and fire with which they were performed. It is by no means impossible that the recent visit of Theodore Thomas's orchestra had a bracing effect upon Herr Paur's men. The Chicago band not only toured the whole East with great success, winning golden opinions everywhere for their grand playing, but even went so far as to invade the Bostonians' own city. Here, too, they "came, played and conquered." It was even hinted that they did some things quite as well, perhaps a shade better, than the pride of Music Hall. Naturally, this was not to be borne. The Boston men felt obliged to wake up and clearly demonstrate that they are still facile princeps.

Now, while this is but a guess, it is by no means an improbable one. Too much flattery is not conducive to stimulating the best efforts of men, either individually or in organizations. And it is a fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been petted, flattered, lauded to the skies, both at home and abroad. It would be singular, indeed, if something short of highest endeavor did not follow. If one is already perfect, where is the need of further exertion? If 15 ounces are gladly accepted by everybody for a pound, what is the use of giving full weights? It is human nature to fall into such ways of thinking and acting. Then comes the need of criticism, keen even to harshness, or the advent of formidable and threatening competition.

Whatever the reason—whether some such procession of cause and effect as that suggested above or merely a happy accident—the fact remains that the Boston orchestra has not given here in years such a remarkable exhibition of power, of fire, of tone quality, of shading, of esprit, of virtuosoship, as was afforded in last night's concert. And this is said deliberately, not forgetting the many excellent and enjoyable performances of past seasons. There was such exquisite attention to the smallest details, such unanimity of action, such a height of technical perfection, and such an overwhelming sonority of tone, such a swing and "go" to everything, that any lingering doubts as to whether this great band is to be ranked first or second were quickly dispelled. The following programme was played:

Karl Maria von Weber, overture to "Der Freischutz." Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte No. 1, in b-flat minor, Op. 23; 1, andante non troppo e molto maestoso (b-flat minor), allegro con spirito (b-flat minor); 2, andantino semplice (d-flat major), allegro vivace assai (d minor); 3, allegro con fuoco (b-flat minor). Robert Schumann, symphony No. 1, in b-flat major, Op. 38; 1, andante un poco maestoso (b-flat major), allegro molto vivace (b-flat major); 2, larghetto (e-flat major); 3, scherzo, molto vivace (d minor), trio 1, molto piu vivace (d major), trio 2 (b-flat major); 4, allegro animato e grazioso (b-flat major).

In the performance the order of the printed programme was reversed, the symphony being played first and the overture last. Of these, the two strictly orchestral numbers, there is little need to say anything except to repeat the statement already made, that they were played with astounding brilliancy. The symphony is one of Schumann's most exquisite orchestral works, being written at a period when his genius was at its freshest. It presents little or nothing of the complexity—and sometimes the obscurity—of his later works, and is scored with great skill and effectiveness. The overture to "Der Freischutz" is one of the most brilliant of opera overtures, and like everything of Weber's is fairly prodigal of melodic beauty. It is deservedly one of the most popular of concert pieces and made a most satisfactory finish to an enjoyable programme.

Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto was given its initial hearing in Boston Music Hall, Oct. 25, 1875, Hans von Bulow being the soloist. Mr. W. F. Apthorp describes the occasion as follows: "This was probably the only time in the history of our city that an important work by a great, world-famous composer had actually been brought out here." There was another "first" connected with the history of this concerto; the first cablegram ever sent from Boston to Moscow was from Von Bulow to Tschaikowsky, announcing the success of the work.

The present writer was one of the small knot of musicians and music-lovers present at the first rehearsal. None of us will ever forget the puissant impression made by the first few measures—the opening horn-phrase, the crashing chords of the orchestra, and then that grand melody of the violins and 'celli. We had no idea of what Von Bulow was playing, but soon came to the conclusion that here was something by a new man; questions were showered upon little Wertembheimer (Von Bulow's business agent), as he passed through the hall. "Tschaikowsky, Tschaikowsky," was the hurriedly whispered reply, accompanied by looks full of important augury. Who Tschaikowsky was, few if any of us then knew; this outlandish name, which most of us even failed to catch, told us nothing. But, before the rehearsal was over, it had become evident enough that this new Tschaikowsky was somebody."

The soloist last evening was Mr. George W. Proctor of Boston, who has recently returned from a prolonged course of study abroad, and has appeared several times this season with the Boston orchestra. Mr. Proctor is certainly a pianist of much talent. His technical equipment is ample, remarkably good in the direction of clearness and the production of a fine singing tone. His interpretation of the concerto was scholarly and refined. Perhaps a little more of dash and vigor might have been safely ventured at times, but upon the whole his performance was most praiseworthy and enjoyable. He was cordially received and was recalled several times.

The eighth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the final one of this season's series, will be given on the evening of Wednesday, April 20.

PUBLIC LEDGER.
Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 22, 1898.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Crowded House Listens to their Farewell Performance of the Season.

The fifth and last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday evening at the Academy of Music. In the arrangement of the programme there was a new and not altogether welcome departure.

The usual soloist was conspicuous by his absence and the whole of the evening following the intermission was devoted to Wagner, five selections in all being given from his works.

What prompted this course is not easy to understand. The orchestra which Mr. Paur has the honor of conducting is one that is pre-eminent in interpreting the words of Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn and some others, but broadly speaking Wagner is out of their line.

If there was ever any doubt upon this subject the playing of the idyll from "Siegfried" and the overture to "Tannhauser" last night should have dispelled it. Coming, too, so swiftly after the splendid Wagnerian work of the Thomas Orchestra, the weakness of their interpretation became more glaringly apparent.

In the idyll, what should have been the soft murmur of the woods and the liquid carol of the birds became a muffled, unmeaning chaos of sounds. Mr. Paur might rise to an Odyssey, but bucolics, apparently, are beneath him.

He was equally as indifferent in the stately measures which conclude the overture to "Tannhauser;" they seemed to possess no charm for him, or not enough, at any rate, to overcome his insatiable appetite for conquering technical difficulties.

He has no time to be stately, consequently the lofty tone of the music was lost in the racing of the violins and the sound and fury of the cymbals and drums.

It would have been far pleasanter, after the magnificent concerts which these admirable musicians have afforded this season, to have chronicled this last effort as their greatest and looked forward to next season with their sweetest strains ringing in our ears, but, for the sake of the future, it is best to be explicit, and next time when we have Wagner let us hope it may be in smaller doses.

There was, however, one important exception in the list of Wagnerian imperfections—the overture to Rienzi, though somewhat noisy at the close, was played with brilliancy and spirit. In such cases, where the hand rather than the heart should be the guide, the orchestra is never found wanting.

The first part of the evening—to speak of what was best last—was devoted to Beethoven's well known Eroica symphony (No. 3, in E flat major), a work that the orchestra have probably played together a great number of times; at any rate they played it as if they had, each separate movement was rendered in that scholarly manner which is the orchestra's greatest charm, and the playing of the whole symphony was as near perfect as possible.

Philadelphia Inquirer
TUESDAY - - - - MARCH 22, 1898

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Last Concert of the Season at the Academy Last Night

The fifth and last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was given at the Academy of Music last night, with the following program:

Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica"	Beethoven
"Rienzi," overture	Wagner
"Siegfried," Idyll	Wagner
"Lohengrin," prelude Act III	Wagner
"Tristan and Isolde," prelude and Isolde's love death	Wagner
"Tannhauser," overture	Wagner

A program such as this does not offer much opportunity for extended criticism, as all of the Wagner numbers in it have been made familiar to concert and opera goers in one form or other. This does not, however, imply that the concert was not an enjoyable one, for it assuredly was from more than one standpoint. As for the Beethoven Symphony it cannot be said that the opening movement—allegro con brio—impresses. There is in it the suggestion of over-elaboration, and despite Mr. Apthorp's criticism in the printed program it is not Beethovenish. All the delicacy with which the strings were played, and the vigor which they bestowed upon the free fantasia could not impart soul to the passage-work. The second movement—marcia funebre—begins to redeem the work and from that on to the furious rush of the finale, melodic surprises follow each other breathlessly and rapidly. It was in the coda that there could be noticed how the conductor succeeds in keeping his brass and woods down to a proper relation with the strings and gets such splendid results. The work was played with technical perfection, and the balance of the various parts was exquisite. Everything came out with delicious clearness, and yet nothing was forced.

The Wagner part of the program was unevenly given. The Rienzi overture had a magnificent interpretation bestowed upon it. The tone throughout was a marvel of purity and sonority and the closest attention was paid to musical "values." The long sustained A on the trumpet, which recalls the marvelous trumpet call in "Fidelio" was given so artistically that it almost opened up a vista of the uprising of the people, while the theme of Rienzi's prayer, given by the violins and 'cello had an incomparable rendition. The "Siegfried" Idyll, with its pastoral glimpses, such as even "Papa" Haydn never furnished, was given with beautiful transparency and reposeful finish. But the Tristan music disappointed in the manner of its playing. Occasionally the tempo was disregarded, little attention was paid to phrasing, and the climax was far from being effective. Yet all this was forgotten in listening to the "Tannhaeuser" overture. Mr. Paur's reading of it was the best ever given in this city, and it was a glorious finale to the concert and to the season.

THE RECORD
Philadelphia, March 22, 1898.

Farewell Boston Symphony Concert.

Rubinstein once described Beethoven as "the musical reverberation of the French Revolution." Not, he hastened to add, of the guillotine, but of the drama itself—"in no wise history set to music, but the tragedy echoing in music which is called 'Liberty, Equality, Fraternity.'" It is impossible to listen to the great maestro's "Eroica" symphony, which was the opening number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert of the season at the Academy last evening, without recalling Rubinstein's remark; although, to be sure, the programme-makers have sometimes sought to read too much of Napoleonic significance into that massive composition. The only allusion to Napoleon in connection with this work that Beethoven is reported to have made after tearing off the dedicatory title page in disgust (on hearing of the coup d'etat) was when that once great colossus of Europe perished on the little isle of St. Helena. "I have already composed the proper music for that catastrophe," sententiously observed this gruff, uncouth giant of heavenly harmonies. As interpreted last night, with such superb magnificence of emotion in the strings, it is plain that the musical echoer of the revolution appreciated its great central hero, in spite of his crimes. The symphony was impressively rendered throughout, with that moderation of personal temperament which is happily developing in Herr Paur. But while this conductor is less extravagant and fantastical in his readings, he still takes considerable liberty with the tempi. The rest of the programme was devoted, as hitherto, to Wagner, the selections being admirably varied and interpreted with characteristic delightfulness.

The North American
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
TUESDAY, MARCH 22, 1898.

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY.

The Closing Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and closing concert of a brilliantly successful season at the Academy of Music last night. As usual, the big house was crowded to the doors, and the occasion was one of great interest and enjoyment. Mr. Paur is not at his best as a conductor of Beethoven's music, and his rendering of the symphony, the great "Eroica," left something to be desired. It was very refined, and delicate, and pretty, but at no time did it sound the heroic note, and even the majestic funeral march had less than its proper impressiveness. It was all too sweet and smooth, too decorously restrained within the bounds of a fastidious dilettanteism, too wanting in elemental force and passion. The second part of the programme, consisting exclusively of Wagnerian selections, was the most satisfying. The playing of the "Rienzi" and "Tannhauser" overtures was superb, and nothing more could have been done with the "Siegfried" idyll or the "Lohengrin" intermezzo, or the "Tristan and Isolde" scena. As a conductor of Wagner's music, Mr. Paur is irreproachable.

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1898.

At the last Boston Symphony concert on Thursday evening the programme was made up entirely of Beethoven and Wagner. The orchestra was in brilliant form, and the three movements of the ninth symphony, with the third "Leonore" overture, were magnificently given. The tone color especially was beyond criticism. In the Wagner selections the orchestra never played with more dash and verve, more delicacy, finish, or warmth. It seemed as if Mr. Paur wished to thrown down the gauntlet to Thomas and Seidl. With the Boston Symphony orchestra Seidl would have made more of Wagner, perhaps, but certainly not of Beethoven. The "Leonore" overture has never been given more delightfully, and the crowded audience of the Metropolitan Opera House were enthusiastic over the rich feast provided them. Mr. Paur certainly conducts the finest orchestra in America.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
MONDAY, MARCH 28, 1898.

INFANTRY HALL.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor,

SEVENTH CONCERT,
WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 30,
AT 8 SHARP.

PROGRAMME:

Weber	Overture to "Der Freischutz"
Tscahikowsky	Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1
Schumann	Symphony No. 1

Soloist,
Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR.

Tickets on sale at INFANTRY HALL.

mch28-3t

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The seventh concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall is announced for next Wednesday evening, March 30. The program, although containing only three numbers, is a most attractive one, containing one most welcome novelty by a composer whose works have taken a most prominent part in concert programs throughout the world. It is both because of the great merit in his compositions, and on account of his comparatively recent and untimely death, that the name of Tschaikowsky is today one to conjure with, wherever the lovers of the best in music are assembled.

The program next Wednesday evening opens with Weber's well known overture to "Der Freischutz." The continued popularity of this overture is evidenced by its having been played in the concerts of this orchestra in Boston 20 times. The opera of "Der Freischutz" was first produced at the Court Opera in Berlin on June 18, 1820. The German word Freischutz means literally "free marksman" or in other words, a marksman who uses charmed bullets which fly to the mark of themselves without depending upon the aim and are therefore aptly termed "free." When Weber first completed the score of the opera the title was "The Huntsman's Betrothed," but it was first given under its present title.

The second number on the program is the Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1 by Tschaikowsky. This concerto was publicly played for the first time on any stage in the Boston Music Hall by Hans von Bulow, on Oct. 25, 1875, when the orchestra was conducted by Mr. B. J. Lang. The writer of the following interesting account was present at the performance which he describes; "This was probably the only time in the history of our city that an important work by a great, world famous composer had actually been brought out here. There was another 'first' connected with the history of this concerto; the first cablegram ever sent from Boston to Moscow was from von Bulow to Tschaikowsky, announcing the success of the work. The present writer was one of the small knot of musicians and music lovers present at the first rehearsal. None of us will ever forget the puissant impression made by the first few measures, the opening horn phrase, the crashing chords of the orchestra, and then that grand melody of the violins and 'cello We had no idea of what von Bulow was playing, but soon came to the conclusion that here was something by a new man; questions were showered upon little Wertembheimer (von Bulow's business agent, as he passed through the hall. 'Tschaikowsky, Tschaikowsky,' was the hurriedly whispered reply, accompanied by looks full of important augury. Who Tschaikowsky was, few if any of us then knew; this outlandish name, which most of us even failed to catch, told us nothing. But before the rehearsal was over, it had become evident enough that this new Tschaikowsky was somebody."

This first performance was followed by others. Mr. Lang played it a year or two later at one of the old symphony concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, and again at the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given on Feb. 21, 1885. The concerto will be played by Mr. George W. Proctor, who has recently returned from an extended sojourn abroad and has appeared with marked success at both the Boston and Cambridge concerts of the orchestra.

The closing number on the program is the Symphony No. 1 by Schumann, which was written in 1841 and first performed at a concert given by Clara Schumann, his wife, at the Leipzig Gewandhaus, by a strange coincidence, exactly 57 years ago. The work bears no descriptive title, although Schumann once said that while writing it he had spring in his mind and even once thought of calling it a "spring symphony." The score is dedicated to Friedrich August, King of Saxony.

THE EVENING BULLETIN.
THURSDAY, MARCH 31, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was the usual large audience, which had the pleasure of listening to one of the most brilliant concerts of the series, brilliant both in the character of the selections offered and the tremendous—one might almost say unusual—amount of energy and fire with which they were performed. It is by no means impossible that the recent visit of Theodore Thomas's orchestra had a bracing effect upon Herr Paur's men. The Chicago band not only toured the whole East with great success, winning golden opinions everywhere for their grand playing, but even went so far as to invade the Bostonians' own city. Here, too, they "came, played and conquered." It was even hinted that they did some things quite as well, perhaps a shade better, than the pride of Music Hall. Naturally, this was not to be borne. The Boston men felt obliged to wake up and clearly demonstrate that they are still facile princeps.

Now, while this is but a guess, it is by no means an improbable one. Too much flattery is not conducive to stimulating the best efforts of men, either individually or in organizations. And it is a fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been petted, flattered, lauded to the skies, both at home and abroad. It would be singular, indeed, if something short of highest endeavor did not follow. If one is already perfect, where is the need of further exertion? If 15 ounces are gladly accepted by everybody for a pound, what is the use of giving full weights? It is human nature to fall into such ways of thinking and acting. Then comes the need of criticism, keen even to harshness, or the advent of formidable and threatening competition.

Whatever the reason—whether some such procession of cause and effect as that suggested above or merely a happy accident—the fact remains that the Boston orchestra has not given here in years such a remarkable exhibition of power, of fire, of tone quality, of shading, of esprit, of virtuosoship, as was afforded in last night's concert. And this is said deliberately, not forgetting the many excellent and enjoyable performances of past seasons. There was such exquisite attention to the smallest details, such unanimity of action, such a height of technical perfection, and such an overwhelming sonority of tone, such a swing and "go" to everything, that any lingering doubts as to whether this great band is to be ranked first or second were quickly dispelled. The following programme was played:

Karl Maria von Weber, overture to "Der Freischutz." Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, concerto for pianoforte No. 1, in b-flat minor, Op. 23; 1, andante non troppo e molto maestoso (b-flat minor), allegro con spirito (b-flat minor); 2, andantino semplice (d-flat major), allegro vivace assai (d minor); 3, allegro con fuoco (b-flat minor). Robert Schumann, symphony No. 1, in b-flat major, Op. 38; 1, andante un poco maestoso (b-flat major), allegro molto vivace (b-flat major); 2, larghetto (e-flat major); 3, scherzo, molto vivace (d minor), trio 1, molto piu vivace (d major), trio 2 (b-flat major); 4, allegro animato e grazioso (b-flat major).

In the performance the order of the printed programme was reversed, the symphony being played first and the overture last. Of these, the two strictly orchestral numbers, there is little need to say anything except to repeat the statement already made, that they were played with astounding brilliancy. The symphony is one of Schumann's most exquisite orchestral works, being written at a period when his genius was at its freshest. It presents little or nothing of the complexity—and sometimes the obscurity—of his later works, and is scored with great skill and effectiveness. The overture to "Der Freischutz" is one of the most brilliant of opera overtures, and like everything of Weber's is fairly prodigal of melodic beauty. It is deservedly one of the most popular of concert pieces and made a most satisfactory finish to an enjoyable programme.

Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto was given its initial hearing in Boston Music Hall, Oct. 25, 1875, Hans von Bulow being the soloist. Mr. W. F. Apthorp describes the occasion as follows: "This was probably the only time in the history of our city that an important work by a great, world-famous composer had actually been brought out here." There was another "first" connected with the history of this concerto; the first cablegram ever sent from Boston to Moscow was from Von Bulow to Tschaikowsky, announcing the success of the work.

The present writer was one of the small knot of musicians and music-lovers present at the first rehearsal. None of us will ever forget the puissant impression made by the first few measures—the opening horn-phrase, the crashing chords of the orchestra, and then that grand melody of the violins and 'celli. We had no idea of what Von Bulow was playing, but soon came to the conclusion that here was something by a new man; questions were showered upon little Wertembheimer (Von Bulow's business agent), as he passed through the hall. "Tschaikowsky, Tschaikowsky," was the hurriedly whispered reply, accompanied by looks full of important augury. Who Tschaikowsky was, few if any of us then knew; this outlandish name, which most of us even failed to catch, told us nothing. But, before the rehearsal was over, it had become evident enough that this new Tschaikowsky was somebody."

The soloist last evening was Mr. George W. Proctor of Boston, who has recently returned from a prolonged course of study abroad, and has appeared several times this season with the Boston orchestra. Mr. Proctor is certainly a pianist of much talent. His technical equipment is ample, remarkably good in the direction of clearness and the production of a fine singing tone. His interpretation of the concerto was scholarly and refined. Perhaps a little more of dash and vigor might have been safely ventured at times, but upon the whole his performance was most praiseworthy and enjoyable. He was cordially received and was recalled several times.

The eighth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the final one of this season's series, will be given on the evening of Wednesday, April 20.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1898.

THE LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House was the most remarkable of the series and also the last. Seldom has the band from Boston played with such overwhelming brilliancy and seldom has it played before such a large and appreciative audience. The outbreak that followed the wonderful performance of the scherzo of the Ninth Symphony was not only a token of enthusiasm aroused by the superlative playing of the orchestra, but it may also be considered a sign of the times. The musical public of New York is sick of slipshod orchestral work, and this season it has testified its love for the classics by crowding the Thomas and Paur concerts whenever the name of Beethoven was announced. Surely there is much in this to console the pessimists who see in Wagner the incarnation of destruction. However, to this concert and its program, which was the following:

Three Movements from the Ninth Symphony, in D minor, op. 125	Beethoven
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72	Beethoven
Rienzi, Overture	Wagner
Siegfried, Idyll	Wagner
Lohengrin, Prelude Act II	Wagner
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Isolde's Love Death	Wagner
Die Walkyrie, Ride of the Walkyries, Act III	Wagner

At the outset one must protest at the length of such a program, and call attention to a singular fact—Wagner did not sound well in the same scheme with the master of masters, Beethoven. This phenomenon we have elsewhere considered. Yet so superbly were all the numbers read that the audience seemed inclined to beg for more. Emil Paur was given an ovation at his entrance, and at the close of the concert he was recalled, and well he deserved the tribute paid him. To conduct as he did such a trying program, and to conduct it with triumphant success, is a task that few could have compassed. The symphony, despite its truncated form, was solidly played, the first movement being rather passionate in exposition and not so rapidly as Mr. Thomas' interpretation. Greater breadth and dramatic significance were gained. This was especially noticeable in the fantaisie and most wonderful of codas.

The scherzo was a masterpiece of execution. In tempo it went even beyond Von Bülow's, particularly in the trio, but it was electric in rhythm, sharp in contour and withal most musical. The tympanist covered himself with vibrating glory. The adagio was lovely in sentiment and color. Such pianos, such crescendos! The permanent orchestra supporters who were present must have felt sick at the poor prospect of their organization ever making such music.

The "Rienzi" overture became a thing of gorgeous color in Mr. Paur's hands. It was taken at an untraditional pace. The Idyll was pregnant in color and line rather than poetical. The "Lohengrin" prelude was another astounding bit of virtuosity, and the conductor had to withstand a fervent appeal for repetition. There were some tremendous climaxes in the "Tristan" music, and the sonorousness of tone, its agreeable massing and, above all, the vocal quality of the strings were so many reminders to us that New York needs just such an orchestra. The "Valkyrie Ride" was polished rather than barbaric, and one missed Seidl's swing. It was a night of nights, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra left us in a blaze of triumph. Where is there such an orchestra in the wide world?

I know that an orchestra will often play in one city better than in another. I am told by good judges that the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays with more precision, strength and swing at home than in New York, and again far better in New York than in Brooklyn. This may be true or false; but this I fully believe: the Chicago orchestra played here for all it was worth. Its success was immediate, indisputable, great. I do not remember anywhere a more intelligent, more musical, nobler performance of the symphonies by Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms. The reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" was singularly clear, and the performance was that of a virtuoso orchestra. The vorspiel to "Lohengrin" and that to "Tristan" were not as effectively performed; they seemed too carefully thought out, too elegant. The accompaniments were a delight.

The strings have a pungent, biting, rather than sensuous, quality. The 'cellos are a little dry. The precision of the brass and woodwind was a lesson to our own orchestra under Mr. Paur. Phrasing and dynamic gradations, dialogue between instruments, sustaining of chords by the wind instruments—these all reflected the highest credit on conductor and men. And again I must refer to the performances of the symphonies by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms: they were performances of a lifetime.

Mr. Ysaye played the Mozart concerto superbly. Nordica declaimed the recitative to the air by Beethoven with unusual breadth and intensity. In the entrance air of Elizabeth, which she introduced in response to hearty applause, as well as in the aria of Beethoven, her upper tones were hollow and the whole voice seemed worn, and in the Isolde scene she was obliged to shout at times below the true pitch. Mr. Hofmann will give a recital Monday. I prefer to postpone criticism of his playing until I have heard him under certain more favorable conditions. Applauded violently yesterday afternoon, he played a melody by Rubinstein and an arrangement—Tausig's, if I am not mistaken—of one of Schubert's marches.

---

* * *

THE last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a revelation of the possibilities of orchestral performance. Not alone virtuosity, but that certain something is present in the playing of this organization that for want of a better name one must call it soul. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a soul, and it took it a decade to develop it. The Philharmonic Society is soulless, because its members meet to play for money, and as there is no pride, no esprit du corps, no artistic conscience, there is no musical soul. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a unique organization, and if Mr. Higginson sees fit to give us a dozen instead of five concerts every season, New York will respond, for there is no home orchestra worthy of the name.

A BOSTON SYMPHONY SUGGESTION.

NEW YORK could, next season, inaugurate a really high-class series of symphony concerts by arranging more frequent visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which this season gave us five delightful concerts unsurpassed in all that is required from an orchestra—tone quality, ensemble, technical perfection, program building, interpretation and style. Mr. Paur and his orchestral organization were the choicest musical morsel New York has had during the period of his concerts.

The five concerts constituted part of a tour embracing one concert in Washington, one in Baltimore, one in Philadelphia, one in New York and two in Brooklyn each, and they occurred at the Metropolitan Opera House on five Thursday nights.

We suggest that seven additional concerts be interspersed, to be given on seven Tuesday nights, making twelve Boston Symphony concerts, and for these additional seven no tours need be made unless the orchestra were to play on Monday nights either at Worcester or Springfield en route to this city, and in both of these cities a subscription guarantee could readily be raised. One of these cities could take four of these Monday nights, the other three, and the orchestra would arrive here during Tuesdays, play on Tuesday nights and return to Boston on the midnight train.

Mr. Higginson is the man to give to New York a permanent orchestra without interfering with the five tours or with the Boston series. If the Metropolitan Opera House could not be had from Mr. Grau for these seven additional concerts, Carnegie Hall could be taken, not only for the seven, but for the whole twelve symphony concerts. That would be a solution of the permanent orchestra scheme, no matter who would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. What we need here is the permanent orchestra, and twelve concerts from November to April would be sufficient.

THE playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday partook of the marvelous. I by no means care for all of Mr. Paur's Wagner, nor were his tempi conventional, but his reading of the Ninth Symphony after Mr. Thomas' was electrical. The composition, which showed contour, only, in fact, its profile, when Theodore of the classic back conducted, became a thing of color, of life, when the Boston boys got to work. I owe this to Mr. Paur, for I have made fun of him many times, and I still maintain that he is the most ungraceful conductor alive. But he did put all that was in him into the music.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the culmination of a successful orchestral season and in many respects the greatest orchestral performance it has ever been my pleasure to hear. I can further emphasize the comparisons indulged in in my last letter as between this orchestra and that of Theodore Thomas, having heard the former since hearing the latter. Mr. Thomas' personality is beyond dispute, and while he has a very superior orchestra, it does not compare with the body of musicians that Mr. Paur directs.

Mr. Paur's reading of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony and the Wagner numbers was in every sense a musical triumph. Mr. Paur never appeared as great to me as he did that evening, and the work of the orchestra was simply superb.

The arrangement of the Wagner numbers was rather peculiar. A chronological arrangement would suggest itself as being the proper thing, but contrast seemed to be the desideratum and from this point of view the arrangement was undoubtedly a success. I feel able to state that the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not be abandoned. Mr. Comee has authorized the contradiction of any statement that may have been circulated as to the discontinuance of these concerts.

Miss Blanche Sanders and Dr. B. M. Hopkinson gave a delightful recital last night at the Woman's College.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, MARCH 31, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventh in the Series Given at Infantry Hall.

Large and Delighted Audience Listened to the Excellent Program.

The seventh concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last evening was delightful and a large audience realized that splendid music had been rendered and that something not heard frequently had been offered by the matchless company. Mr. George W. Proctor, a young pianist, appeared with the orchestra in this city for the first time and his work was a passport into the musical appreciation of even the most critical. The program was as follows: Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23. I. Andante non troppe e molto maestoso (B-flat minor), 3-4; Allegro con spirito (B-flat minor) 4-4. II. Andantino semplice (D-flat major) 6-8; Allegro vivace assai (D minor), 6-8.. III. Allegro con fuoco (B-flat minor), 3-4.

Robert Schumann, Symphony No 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso (B-flat major), 4-4; Allegro molto vivace (B-flat major), 2-4. II. Larghetto E-flat major), 3-8. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace (D-minor), 4-4; Trio I.: Molto piu vivace (D major), 2-4 Trio II. (B-flat major), 3-4 IV. Allegro animato e grazioso (B-flat major), 2-2.

Karl Maria von Weber, Overture to "Der Freischutz."

Schumann when he completed this symphony was at a loss what to call it and it never really had a name. He had spring in his mind and it is sometimes called his spring symphony. It was never much of a favorite from the start and at its first performance at Leipsig in March, 1841 it was almost laughed at. Schumann, however, fixed it up and as performed last evening it revealed much of the wonderful power of the great composer.

Mr. Paur gave it an intelligent and effective reading and the orchestra through its agency had an opportunity to instruct music lovers in rather unfamiliar music. There are passages in this symphony that stand with the best product and it was a welcome number to trained ears as well as those who are content with agreeable tones and that element of music which comes through the vision.

Mr. Proctor, the soloist of this occasion, is a young man, tall and good looking. He wears his hair like the ideal pianist and he plays with remarkable skill, assurance and authority. He did not select child's play for his introduction. Tschaikowsky is not for fledgelings and his No. 1 Concerto requires the brains and hands of a master. He was considerately treated by Mr. Proctor. The young man has all the expected equipment of technique, muscular energy and concentration. He also plays as though he was competent to surmount anything on the score. This concerto was first played on October 25, 1875, in Music Hall, Boston, by Hans von Bulow. The author was practically unknown at that time but von Bulow introduced another musical genius to America. The success of the work was in question during the opening passages, but as it progressed with its sumptuous orchestration, its masterful score for the solo instrument, and unfolded new ideas, a new star was recognized and the concerto was put in the niche with great ones. The work is in the lamented and gifted composer's most elaborate and commanding style. Mr. Proctor interpreted and executed the work in a matchless manner and at conclusion the three times repeated plaudits of the large audience, and the nods of approval from the accomplished musicians of the orchestra attested the measure of success the new pianist had achieved. He may be ranked with the best players ever heard in this city.

The overture to "Der Freischutz," or "Marksman with Charmed Bullets," made a charming close to the brilliant concert. This opera was first produced in June, 182[illegible], and it had a varied experience. It never attained genuine popularity, although the overture always held a warm corner in the hearts of true music lovers. It begins with a slow plaintive movement which is continued for several measures, and it is beautiful music. It then goes on and suggests the supernatural elements of the opera and changes from plaintive to defiant strains with engrossing effects. It was played superbly and at its close the fine audience retired from the hall with a delightful sensation of satisfaction. The only fault to be found with this evening of music was that it was too brief.

The final concert of the season's beautiful series will take place in Infantry Hall, on Wednesday evening, April 20.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30, 1898.

THE LAST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

THE concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House was the most remarkable of the series and also the last. Seldom has the band from Boston played with such overwhelming brilliancy and seldom has it played before such a large and appreciative audience. The outbreak that followed the wonderful performance of the scherzo of the Ninth Symphony was not only a token of enthusiasm aroused by the superlative playing of the orchestra, but it may also be considered a sign of the times. The musical public of New York is sick of slipshod orchestral work, and this season it has testified its love for the classics by crowding the Thomas and Paur concerts whenever the name of Beethoven was announced. Surely there is much in this to console the pessimists who see in Wagner the incarnation of destruction. However, to this concert and its program, which was the following:

Three Movements from the Ninth Symphony, in D minor, op. 125	Beethoven
Overture to Leonore, No. 3, op. 72	Beethoven
Rienzi, Overture	Wagner
Siegfried, Idyll	Wagner
Lohengrin, Prelude Act II	Wagner
Tristan and Isolde, Prelude and Isolde's Love Death	Wagner
Die Walkyrie, Ride of the Walkyries, Act III	Wagner

At the outset one must protest at the length of such a program, and call attention to a singular fact—Wagner did not sound well in the same scheme with the master of masters, Beethoven. This phenomenon we have elsewhere considered. Yet so superbly were all the numbers read that the audience seemed inclined to beg for more. Emil Paur was given an ovation at his entrance, and at the close of the concert he was recalled, and well he deserved the tribute paid him. To conduct as he did such a trying program, and to conduct it with triumphant success, is a task that few could have compassed. The symphony, despite its truncated form, was solidly played, the first movement being rather passionate in exposition and not so rapidly as Mr. Thomas' interpretation. Greater breadth and dramatic significance were gained. This was especially noticeable in the fantaisie and most wonderful of codas.

The scherzo was a masterpiece of execution. In tempo it went even beyond Von Bülow's, particularly in the trio, but it was electric in rhythm, sharp in contour and withal most musical. The tympanist covered himself with vibrating glory. The adagio was lovely in sentiment and color. Such pianos, such crescendos! The permanent orchestra supporters who were present must have felt sick at the poor prospect of their organization ever making such music.

The "Rienzi" overture became a thing of gorgeous color in Mr. Paur's hands. It was taken at an untraditional pace. The Idyll was pregnant in color and line rather than poetical. The "Lohengrin" prelude was another astounding bit of virtuosity, and the conductor had to withstand a fervent appeal for repetition. There were some tremendous climaxes in the "Tristan" music, and the sonorousness of tone, its agreeable massing and, above all, the vocal quality of the strings were so many reminders to us that New York needs just such an orchestra. The "Valkyrie Ride" was polished rather than barbaric, and one missed Seidl's swing. It was a night of nights, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra left us in a blaze of triumph. Where is there such an orchestra in the wide world?

I know that an orchestra will often play in one city better than in another. I am told by good judges that the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays with more precision, strength and swing at home than in New York, and again far better in New York than in Brooklyn. This may be true or false; but this I fully believe: the Chicago orchestra played here for all it was worth. Its success was immediate, indisputable, great. I do not remember anywhere a more intelligent, more musical, nobler performance of the symphonies by Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms. The reading of Strauss' "Don Juan" was singularly clear, and the performance was that of a virtuoso orchestra. The vorspiel to "Lohengrin" and that to "Tristan" were not as effectively performed; they seemed too carefully thought out, too elegant. The accompaniments were a delight.

The strings have a pungent, biting, rather than sensuous, quality. The 'cellos are a little dry. The precision of the brass and woodwind was a lesson to our own orchestra under Mr. Paur. Phrasing and dynamic gradations, dialogue between instruments, sustaining of chords by the wind instruments—these all reflected the highest credit on conductor and men. And again I must refer to the performances of the symphonies by Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms: they were performances of a lifetime.

Mr. Ysaye played the Mozart concerto superbly. Nordica declaimed the recitative to the air by Beethoven with unusual breadth and intensity. In the entrance air of Elizabeth, which she introduced in response to hearty applause, as well as in the aria of Beethoven, her upper tones were hollow and the whole voice seemed worn, and in the Isolde scene she was obliged to shout at times below the true pitch. Mr. Hofmann will give a recital Monday. I prefer to postpone criticism of his playing until I have heard him under certain more favorable conditions. Applauded violently yesterday afternoon, he played a melody by Rubinstein and an arrangement—Tausig's, if I am not mistaken—of one of Schubert's marches.

* * *

THE last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was a revelation of the possibilities of orchestral performance. Not alone virtuosity, but that certain something is present in the playing of this organization that for want of a better name one must call it soul. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a soul, and it took it a decade to develop it. The Philharmonic Society is soulless, because its members meet to play for money, and as there is no pride, no esprit du corps, no artistic conscience, there is no musical soul. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a unique organization, and if Mr. Higginson sees fit to give us a dozen instead of five concerts every season, New York will respond, for there is no home orchestra worthy of the name.

A BOSTON SYMPHONY SUGGESTION.

NEW YORK could, next season, inaugurate a really high-class series of symphony concerts by arranging more frequent visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which this season gave us five delightful concerts unsurpassed in all that is required from an orchestra—tone quality, ensemble, technical perfection, program building, interpretation and style. Mr. Paur and his orchestral organization were the choicest musical morsel New York has had during the period of his concerts.

The five concerts constituted part of a tour embracing one concert in Washington, one in Baltimore, one in Philadelphia, one in New York and two in Brooklyn each, and they occurred at the Metropolitan Opera House on five Thursday nights.

We suggest that seven additional concerts be interspersed, to be given on seven Tuesday nights, making twelve Boston Symphony concerts, and for these additional seven no tours need be made unless the orchestra were to play on Monday nights either at Worcester or Springfield en route to this city, and in both of these cities a subscription guarantee could readily be raised. One of these cities could take four of these Monday nights, the other three, and the orchestra would arrive here during Tuesdays, play on Tuesday nights and return to Boston on the midnight train.

Mr. Higginson is the man to give to New York a permanent orchestra without interfering with the five tours or with the Boston series. If the Metropolitan Opera House could not be had from Mr. Grau for these seven additional concerts, Carnegie Hall could be taken, not only for the seven, but for the whole twelve symphony concerts. That would be a solution of the permanent orchestra scheme, no matter who would be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. What we need here is the permanent orchestra, and twelve concerts from November to April would be sufficient.

THE playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Thursday partook of the marvelous. I by no means care for all of Mr. Paur's Wagner, nor were his tempi conventional, but his reading of the Ninth Symphony after Mr. Thomas' was electrical. The composition, which showed contour, only, in fact, its profile, when Theodore of the classic back conducted, became a thing of color, of life, when the Boston boys got to work. I owe this to Mr. Paur, for I have made fun of him many times, and I still maintain that he is the most ungraceful conductor alive. But he did put all that was in him into the music.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was the culmination of a successful orchestral season and in many respects the greatest orchestral performance it has ever been my pleasure to hear. I can further emphasize the comparisons indulged in in my last letter as between this orchestra and that of Theodore Thomas, having heard the former since hearing the latter. Mr. Thomas' personality is beyond dispute, and while he has a very superior orchestra, it does not compare with the body of musicians that Mr. Paur directs.

Mr. Paur's reading of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony and the Wagner numbers was in every sense a musical triumph. Mr. Paur never appeared as great to me as he did that evening, and the work of the orchestra was simply superb.

The arrangement of the Wagner numbers was rather peculiar. A chronological arrangement would suggest itself as being the proper thing, but contrast seemed to be the desideratum and from this point of view the arrangement was undoubtedly a success. I feel able to state that the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not be abandoned. Mr. Comee has authorized the contradiction of any statement that may have been circulated as to the discontinuance of these concerts.

Miss Blanche Sanders and Dr. B. M. Hopkinson gave a delightful recital last night at the Woman's College.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

THURSDAY, MARCH 31, 1898.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seventh in the Series Given at Infantry Hall.

Large and Delighted Audience Listened to the Excellent Program.

The seventh concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last evening was delightful and a large audience realized that splendid music had been rendered and that something not heard frequently had been offered by the matchless company. Mr. George W. Proctor, a young pianist, appeared with the orchestra in this city for the first time and his work was a passport into the musical appreciation of even the most critical. The program was as follows: Peter Ilyitch Tschaikowsky, Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23. I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso (B-flat minor), 3-4; Allegro con spirito (B-flat minor) 4-4 II. Andantino semplice (D-flat major) 6-8; Allegro vivace assai (D minor), 6-8. III. Allegro con fuoco (B-flat minor), 3-4.

Robert Schumann, Symphony No 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso (B-flat major), 4-4; Allegro molto vivace (B-flat major), 2-4. II. Larghetto E-flat major), 3-8. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace (D-minor), 4-4; Trio I.: Molto piu vivace (D major), 2-4 Trio II. (B-flat major), 3-4 IV. Allegro animato e grazioso (B-flat major), 2-2.

Karl Maria von Weber, Overture to "Der Freischutz."

Schumann when he completed this symphony was at a loss what to call it and it never really had a name. He had spring in his mind and it is sometimes called his spring symphony. It was never much of a favorite from the start and at its first performance at Leipsig in March, 1841 it was almost laughed at. Schumann, however, fixed it up and as performed last evening it revealed much of the wonderful power of the great composer.

Mr. Paur gave it an intelligent and effective reading and the orchestra through its agency had an opportunity to instruct music lovers in rather unfamiliar music. There are passages in this symphony that stand with the best product and it was a welcome number to trained ears as well as those who are content with agreeable tones and that element of music which comes through the vision.

Mr. Proctor, the soloist of this occasion, is a young man, tall and good looking. He wears his hair like the ideal pianist and he plays with remarkable skill, assurance and authority. He did not select child's play for his introduction. Tschaikowsky is not for fledgelings and his No. 1 Concerto requires the brains and hands of a master. He was considerately treated by Mr. Proctor. This young man has all the expected equipment of technique, muscular energy and concentration. He also plays as though he was competent to surmount anything on the score. This concerto was first played on October 25, 1875, in Music Hall, Boston, by Hans von Bulow. The author was practically unknown at that time but von Bulow introduced another musical genius to America. The success of the work was in question during the opening passages, but as it progressed with its sumptuous orchestration, its masterful score for the solo instrument, and unfolded new ideas, a new star was recognized and the concerto was put in the niche with great ones. The work is in the lamented and gifted composer's most elaborate and commanding style. Mr. Proctor interpreted and executed the work in a matchless manner and at conclusion the three times repeated plaudits of the large audience, and the nods of approval from the accomplished musicians of the orchestra attested the measure of success the new pianist had achieved. He may be ranked with the best players ever heard in this city.

The overture to "Der Freischutz," or "Marksman with Charmed Bullets," made a charming close to the brilliant concert. This opera was first produced in June, 1821, and it had a varied experience. It never attained genuine popularity, although the overture always held a warm corner in the hearts of true music lovers. It begins with a slow plaintive movement which is continued for several measures, and it is beautiful music. It then goes on and suggests the supernatural elements of the opera and changes from plaintive to defiant strains with engrossing effects. It was played superbly and at its close the fine audience retired from the hall with a delightful sensation of satisfaction. The only fault to be found with this evening of music was that it was too brief.

The final concert of the season's beautiful series will take place in Infantry Hall, on Wednesday evening, April 20.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 4, 1898.

A Programme of Symphonies at the Symphony Concert.

Saturday night was symphony night in more senses than one. The whole programme consisted of symphonies. The lively little symphony in G major, No. 13, written by Haydn for his Paris admirers; the Jupiter Symphony in C major, by Mozart; and finally Symphony No. 8, in F major, by Beethoven. Good, better, best.

These symphonies have, of course, been presented by the orchestra before, but we do not remember at any time having precisely this group presented together.

In some ways the very grouping of the three symphonies is striking. If the Mozart number had been played first the group might have been called an historic study in the symphony; but there were good reasons for placing the Mozart and the Beethoven numbers next to each other.

Of the Haydn symphony, one may say briefly that it resembles that of Mozart in its profusion of airs or melodies as contrasted with a search after a more scientific and broader scheme of music. A melody is pretty, but it is not the richest form of music, any more than a rhyme is in itself the highest form of poetry.

The Mozart symphony in some ways represents a mean between the styles of Haydn and Beethoven. Mozart undoubtedly sought after orchestral effects in the Jupiter symphony, which was the greatest symphony offered to the world before the French Revolution. The Mozart symphony combines an abundance of tuneful melodies, with a large, broad, compelling scheme of orchestration that compels respect.

It is perhaps useless at this time to speculate whether Mozart would not have done greater and grander work if he had not been so harassed by "life's little ironies." Certainly the Jupiter symphony gives promise of much; yet it was written almost with the speed with which a reporter turns out copy of some great event within ten minutes before the time for going to press.

The completion of Mozart's three last symphonies, Nos. 47, 48 and 49, was announced within seven weeks. If he had contented himself with one symphony within that time and had carried out his work on the scale seen in the Jupiter symphony, what might not the world have had?

Of the Beethoven symphony in F major it is almost sufficient to say that it was next to the last of the famous nine. As there were other of the famous Haydn symphonies in G major so there was another of the Beethoven symphonies in F—the great "Pastoral" symphony.

As Mozart wrote the Jupiter symphony under the burden of perplexities, annoyances and grievances so Beethoven wrote the Eighth Symphony while under the cloud of bad health.

With the Jupiter symphony and its group Mozart stopped writing. After the completion of the Ninth Symphony, Beethoven rested for 11 years. Both of these symphonies, therefore, were put forth apparently as some crowning effort—a prelude to a long-continued and much-needed rest from work.

There is, however, one striking point of difference between Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Mozart's Jupiter Symphony. The former was the result of many changes, alterations, and abandoned ideas. Apparently Beethoven began his symphony in the key of A, then changed it to D and finally to F. Records of his trials of different movements and his almost total transformation of his original plans still exist.

And yet Beethoven at that time was writing symphonies at what may be called a rather rapid rate, as he was turning out two masterpieces a year. Sometimes, however, he did not disdain to take a theme that might well be discarded as almost cheap and commonplace; but he made it into something grand and wonderful.

The finale is certainly in depth of feeling, in broadness of execution and fulfillment, the crowning movement of the symphony. Yet it begins with a subject which seems as simple and as little impressive as some four finger exercise in a primary book of musical instruction.

On the other hand, to return to comparisons between the Eighth Symphony and the Jupiter Symphony, they have another point of likeness in the fact that Beethoven has here discarded his favorite scherzo for the allegro "Scherzando" and has returned to the minuet and trio of Mozart's time. The minuet, however, almost consoles one for the lack of the brilliant and impish scherzo that we might have had. Even Richard Wagner singles it out for special praise.

In other ways, the programme of the concert was worthy of remark. There are those who shudder whenever the orchestra produces anything from a very modern composer, and who apparently think that anything new must be necessarily frivolous.

There was a clean concession to these critics, therefore, in the generous gift of an evening of classic symphonies and nothing else; and there was a little element of humor in the concession that may be generally relished. It was as pat as the humor of the Eighth Symphony itself, and it was equally enjoyable.

Of the work of the orchestra, it is almost impossible to speak too highly. At the last presentation of the Eighth Symphony under Mr. Paur's direction, it was said in these columns and elsewhere that the work was that of the orchestra at its best; and perhaps any description of the rendering of the symphony Saturday evening would be merely a repetition in substance if not in form, of what was said then.

Of the Mozart and the Haydn symphonies, it may be added that they were given in the classic spirit, as handed down by tradition from one musical generation to another. The Haydn symphony in particular was not tortured out of all resemblance to the music that Papa Haydn wrote—although such torture has been permitted right here in Boston and by the same orchestra, although under a different regime.

The programme for next Saturday will [illegible] Schubert's unfinished symphony, [illegible] from suite No. 2, Peer Gynt, [illegible] "Carnival" overture. Mrs. [illegible] is to sing an aria from [illegible] Wagnerian songs.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII. NO. 93.
SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Triple Bill of Classical Works.

Three Symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, Are Given—All of Them Interpreted in a Way to Win Applause for Mr. Paur and the Orchestra.

Last evening the 20th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall, with this programme:

Symphony in G, Peters, No. 8..........Haydn
Symphony in C, "Jupiter"..........Mozart
Symphony No. 8, in F..........Beethoven

Three symphonies in one evening has a somewhat discouraging aspect, but the three played on this occasion were less portentous in the hearing than they appeared to be in the announcement, and they were interesting in conjunction and in the order in which they were given, as illustrating the growth of the symphony from its founder to its greatest exponent, though, in point of date, Mozart's work was written nine years before Haydn's, the latter having been composed in 1787, and the former in 1778, Beethoven's having seen the light in 1812, the lapse of time between the "Jupiter" and the last but one of Beethoven's symphonies being 34 years.

Speaking of the Haydn symphony, the programme book says that in it the form is already fully established, as it well might be, when it is considered that when it was first played the three great symphonies of Mozart had been in existence nearly a decade.

On the whole, the "Jupiter" received the best treatment at the hands of Mr. Paur last evening. It was perfectly read and exquisitely played. The opening allegro of the Haydn symphony seemed to be taken at too rapid a pace for the due presentation of its characteristic effect, while the finale was given in a rapid tempo, at which it is very doubtful if the players of the composer's time could have performed it. The Haydn gayety was there, but something of the Haydn color was missing. The joyous and graceful Beethoven work, except for an unaccustomed excess of fire and possibly of roughness in the minuet, was charmingly interpreted.

Mr. Pourtau, in the trio of the minuet, rendered the difficult clarinet passage with exquisite clearness and with incomparable purity and delicacy of tone. The allegretto scherzando was given in a manner that emphasized its piquancy with delightful effect. There was much applause for both Mr. Paur and the orchestra.

The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished symphony, Schubert; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; selections from suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Wagner's songs, "Traeume" and "Schmerzen," and overture, "Carneral," Dvorak. The soloist is to be Mrs. Josephine Jacoby.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1898.

Twentieth Symphony Concert Program.

The program for the 20th symphony was of the most substantial character, the selections comprising Haydn's G major symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" and Bethoven's eighth symphonies. There was no soloist. The familiar works were interpreted in an admirable manner, the orchestra responding with promptness and sympathy to Mr Paur's guiding baton. The second movement in the Haydn symphony deserves special mention for the masterly work of the oboe and cellos, supplemented by the beautiful musical arabesques of the strings. The minuet and trio was given with charming simplicity, and no fault need be found with the brilliancy of the final movement.

Mozart's C major symphony, generally called "Jupiter," does not justify its sub title when compared with more modern works, especially those of the Russian school; but its tone colors are vivid and not the diabolical representations of writers of the present advanced style of descriptive music, and the beauties of the composition are undeniable, the lighter portions of the symphony being specially melodic and brilliant. The selection was played most effectively by the orchestra. The triumphant measures of Beethoven's eighth were heard with evident pleasure by the large audience. The humorous tick-tack of the second movement and the hilarious fourth part awakened most hearty plaudits, as usual. The orchestra work throughout was as buoyant, sympathetic and harmonious as one could desire.

Mrs Josephine Jacoby will be the soloist this week. The program will be as follows: Schubert, unfinished symphony; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus"; Grieg, selections "Peer Gynt"; Wagner, songs with pianoforte; Dvorak, overture, "Carneval."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening in Music Hall, consisted of the symphonies: Haydn in G major No. 3, Mozart in C major (Jupiter) and Beethoven in F major No. 8, op. 93.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert includes Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor; Grieg's "Peer Gynt," suite No. 2, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Mrs. Josephine Jacoby will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Program Made Up Exclusively of Symphonies Which Were for the Most Part Coarsely Played.

The program of the 20th Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13)
Haydn
Symphony, "Jupiter"..........Mozart
Symphony No. 8..........Beethoven

Let us not waste space in reasoning together concerning the character of the program, which to me was a senseless, intolerable freak. Let us consider for a moment the performance.

It was unfortunate for the orchestra that it made its reappearance after a trip on which, as I am told, it covered itself with glory, with a program of this nature. For in the present condition of the orchestra such symphonies show as in clear noon its weaknesses, and do not bring out its indisputable strength. Mr. Paur is far more successful in his treatment of works of the romantic school than in his treatment of such works as the symphonies chosen last night.

In each of these symphonies, and especially in the eighth of Beethoven, there were frequent instances of a lack of finesse, and more than once there was utter disregard of the composer's indicated intentions. Take, for instance, the last dozen measures of the first movement of the eighth symphony: There was no attempt to make a diminuendo in the wood wind, there was no pianissimo at the end, there were no dynamic gradations between strings and wind, there were no effects of color. The whole of the allegretto was coarse and heavy. There was not the slightest pretence of a steady staccato pianissimo of the oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns that furnish the accompaniment, nor were expression marks regarded at all in measures that are most carefully marked. In the trio of the menuetto the horns and the first clarinet afforded a delightful relief to the stolidity of the performance as a whole. Again in the finale (page 40 of Peters's edition) what an Olympian contempt for the indication "sempre pianissimo"!

And in the symphonies that preceded there was constant exaggeration in accentuation, there was apparent inability to carry out a phrase with sustained softness, there was a constant confounding of forte with fortissimo. Mr. Paur is too inclined to leap from piano to fortissimo; he does not appear to be fond of intermediate gradations; he frequently anticipates a climax, and the result is unmeaning explosiveness.

Even in moments of the exhibition of strength there should be the suggestion of reserve force.

Just as the symphony by Hadyn—and are there not others by him that well deserve a hearing?—was without real elegance or distinction, so the fugue in the symphony by Mozart was often without sense of proportion, and where there should have been clear polyphony there was a noisy blur.

Far be it from me to disparge the merits of the individual players or the splendor of the ensemble in works of the romantic school. The virtuosity of this orchestra is at times dazzling. But there is also a virtuosity in performances of the classics, and in the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the virtuosity that we have a right to expect does not always appear when the symphony is by Mozart or Haydn; it does not always appear when the symphony is by Beethoven. Surely the great masters of the past demand as much intelligence in the reading and as much intelligence and pains in the rehearsing as do the interesting or extravagant composers of the present day.

Philip Hale.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3.

An orchestral concert, given as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra know how to give, was enjoyed by an immense concourse of music lovers at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening, March 24. With regret we say adieu to the superb organization, for we shall not look upon its like again, until another musical era dawns upon us. The program was composed entirely of the music of the great masters, Beethoven and Wagner, and wonderful were the interpretations of the beautiful Ninth Symphony, the overture to "Leonore," the "Rienzi" prelude, the "Siegfried" Idyll, the prelude to the second act of "Lohengrin," the prelude and finale of "Tristan und Isolde," and the "Ride of the Valkyries." Never before have I heard the latter number given with such electrifying brilliancy and faultless precision. Truly, like angels' visits, are the concerts given us by the greatest symphonic orchestra in our country, led by Mr. Paur, and called the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1898.

Mr. Paur's annual programme of three symphonies in historical array was assigned to last night's concert and consisted of Haydn in G, Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's eighth. There is little to be said beyond the record, for neither of these works makes any extreme demand upon the capacity of the band, and when it is said that more calmness of spirit and emphasis would have well become some isolated pages of the earlier works, there is no exception to be taken.

At the next concert the orchestra will play Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, a part of Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. A stranger here, Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, will sing, her selections being only less aged than Mrs. Henschels's. They are the "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and Wagner's "Taume" and "Schmerzen."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 4, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13; Peters, No. 8).
Mozart: Symphony No. 49, in C major, "Jupiter."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93.

Three classical symphonies on the same programme are enough to frighten some people. But the bark of such a programme is worse than its bite. We own that we had our misgivings beforehand, and heard some excellent musicians express theirs, too. It was not so much the mere fact of there being three symphonies—nor that of the symphonies being by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, without any admixture of more modern matter—that was objected to, as that of Mozart's "Jupiter" coming in the middle. It was feared that Beethoven's eighth would sound trivial and gustless after that tremendous finale of the "Jupiter"; nothing, it was said, short of Beethoven's great C minor could hold its own after that matchless fugued movement of Mozart's. We ourselves half shared this fear, although we certainly had considerable faith in the power of the first phrase of Beethoven's eighth to snatch the listener out of any possible previous mood, and throw him immediately into its own.

Well! the proof of the pudding is in the eating; and we, who can report only on the test of our own palate, got such keen, unalloyed, absolute enjoyment out of the concert that it would be sheer artistic pusillanimity on our part to allow any theoretical considerations of right or wrong, fit or unfit, wise or the reverse, to weaken our expression of that enjoyment. Like the noble Kentuckian at the French table d'hote, who exclaimed: "I like pie, and I don't care who else does n't!" we found ourselves, for once, quite oblivious of what the rest of the audience might think about the three symphonies; in plain English, we had the best time we have had at a symphony concert this season.

There was the admirable symphony by Haydn, with its divinely beautiful Largo, its spicy minuet and inimitable nimble finale; one of the most perfect symphonies the old master ever wrote. Then Mozart's ever-great "Jupiter," as perfect on its higher plane, with its wider scope, of emotion as Haydn's on its lower level; more vigorous in conception, with a stronger hand at the bellows, more intense in feeling and poetic in imagination; bespeaking a higher cast of genius. And then, after Mozart's finale had swept you up to the loftiest regions even his mighty genius ever reached—save perhaps in some passages of "Don Giovanni" or the "Zauberflöte"—came that sudden summons to joyfulness in the opening phrase of Beethoven's eighth! Greater than Mozart's "Jupiter?" not by any means, if perhaps as great in another way; but more subtile, at once more sly and more profound, more essentially modern; the laughing silver edge of a thunder-cloud that persistently turns its silver toward you, so bright and alluring that you forget for the moment its potentiality of thunder. What a stroke of genius that opening phrase is! was there ever anything more irresistible in all music? anything more immediately overmastering, that claimed you more imperatively for its own? That phrase belongs to the lost arts; it came into the world copyrighted by the grace of God, with a copyright that will never run out. And how Beethoven keeps the whole symphony up to its level! Here is a hymn to all the sly, mocking, laughing deities and graces that will ever seek its fellow.

No, we cannot see how the programme could have been better arranged. On the printed page it looked a trifle "historical"; but he must have been a sad-minded man indeed who could think of anything so dry as history while listening to it. It was a programme to be drunk in, to be revelled in, like fine old claret, Burgundy and champagne—and no headache next day!

The reading and performance of the three masterpieces was, for the most part, so capital that we felt no impulse to pick a flaw here and there, based on difference of opinion. Where supreme contentment reigns, one would be foolish to be troubled by trifles.

The next programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Gluck, aria from "Orphée"; Grieg, selections from suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt"; Wagner, songs with pianoforte, "Träume," and "Schmerzen"; Dvorak, overture, "Carneval," opus 92. Mrs. Josephine Jacoby will be the singer.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 4, 1893.

A Programme of Symphonies at the Symphony Concert.

Saturday night was symphony night in more senses than one. The whole programme consisted of symphonies. The lively little symphony in G major, No. 13, written by Haydn for his Paris admirers; the Jupiter Symphony in C major, by Mozart; and finally Symphony No. 8, in F major, by Beethoven. Good, better, best.

These symphonies have, of course, been presented by the orchestra before, but we do not remember at any time having precisely this group presented together.

In some ways the very grouping of the three symphonies is striking. If the Mozart number had been played first the group might have been called an historic study in the symphony; but there were good reasons for placing the Mozart and the Beethoven numbers next to each other.

Of the Haydn symphony, one may say briefly that it resembles that of Mozart in its profusion of airs or melodies as contrasted with a search after a more scientific and broader scheme of music. A melody is pretty, but it is not the richest form of music, any more than a rhyme is in itself the highest form of poetry.

The Mozart symphony in some ways represents a mean between the styles of Haydn and Beethoven. Mozart undoubtedly sought after orchestral effects in the Jupiter symphony, which was the greatest symphony offered to the world before the French Revolution. The Mozart symphony combines an abundance of tuneful melodies, with a large, broad, compelling scheme of orchestration that compels respect.

It is perhaps useless at this time to speculate whether Mozart would not have done greater and grander work if he had not been so harassed by "life's little ironies." Certainly the Jupiter symphony gives promise of much; yet it was written almost with the speed with which a reporter turns out copy of some great event within ten minutes before the time for going to press.

The completion of Mozart's three last symphonies, Nos. 47, 48 and 49, was announced within seven weeks. If he had contented himself with one symphony within that time and had carried out his work on the scale seen in the Jupiter symphony, what might not the world have had?

Of the Beethoven symphony in F major it is almost sufficient to say that it was next to the last of the famous nine. As there were other of the famous Haydn symphonies in G major so there was another of the Beethoven symphonies in F—the great "Pastoral" symphony.

As Mozart wrote the Jupiter symphony under the burden of perplexities, annoyances and grievances so Beethoven wrote the Eighth Symphony while under the cloud of bad health.

With the Jupiter symphony and its group Mozart stopped writing. After the completion of the Ninth Symphony, Beethoven rested for 11 years. Both of these symphonies, therefore, were put forth apparently as some crowning effort—a prelude to a long-continued and much-needed rest from work.

There is, however, one striking point of difference between Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Mozart's Jupiter Symphony. The former was the result of many changes, alterations, and abandoned ideas. Apparently Beethoven began his symphony in the key of A, then changed it to D and finally to F. Records of his trials of different movements and his almost total transformation of his original plans still exist.

And yet Beethoven at that time was writing symphonies at what may be called a rather rapid rate, as he was turning out two masterpieces a year. Sometimes, however, he did not disdain to take a theme that might well be discarded as almost cheap and commonplace; but he made it into something grand and wonderful.

The finale is certainly in depth of feeling, in broadness of execution and fulfillment, the crowning movement of the symphony. Yet it begins with a subject which seems as simple and as little impressive as some four finger exercise in a primary book of musical instruction.

On the other hand, to return to comparisons between the Eighth Symphony and the Jupiter Symphony, they have another point of likeness in the fact that Beethoven has here discarded his favorite scherzo for the allegro "Scherzando" and has returned to the minuet and trio of Mozart's time. The minuet, however, almost consoles one for the lack of the brilliant and impish scherzo that we might have had. Even Richard Wagner singles it out for special praise.

In other ways, the programme of the concert was worthy of remark. There are those who shudder whenever the orchestra produces anything from a very modern composer, and who apparently think that anything new must be necessarily frivolous.

There was a clean concession to these critics, therefore, in the generous gift of an evening of classic symphonies and nothing else; and there was a little element of humor in the concession that may be generally relished. It was as pat as the humor of the Eighth Symphony itself, and it was equally enjoyable.

Of the work of the orchestra, it is almost impossible to speak too highly. At the last presentation of the Eighth Symphony under Mr. Paur's direction, it was said in these columns and elsewhere that the work was that of the orchestra at its best; and perhaps any description of the rendering of the symphony Saturday evening would be merely a repetition in substance if not in form, of what was said then.

Of the Mozart and the Haydn symphonies, it may be added that they were given in the classic spirit, as handed down by tradition from one musical generation to another. The Haydn symphony in particular was not tortured out of all resemblance to the music that Papa Haydn wrote—although such torture has been perpetrated right here in Boston and by the self-same orchestra, although under a different regime.

The programme for next Saturday will include Schubert's unfinished symphony, selections from suite No. 2, Peer Gynt, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Mrs. Josephine Jacoby is to sing an aria from Orpheus and two Wagnerian songs.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 93.
SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Interesting Triple Bill of Classical Works.

Three Symphonies, by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, Are Given—All of Them Interpreted in a Way to Win Applause for Mr. Paur and the Orchestra.

Last evening the 20th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall, with this programme:

Symphony in G, Peters, No. 8.........Haydn
Symphony in C, "Jupiter"..............Mozart
Symphony No. 8, in F.............Beethoven

Three symphonies in one evening has a somewhat discouraging aspect, but the three played on this occasion were less portentous in the hearing than they appeared to be in the announcement, and they were interesting in conjunction and in the order in which they were given, as illustrating the growth of the symphony from its founder to its greatest exponent, though, in point of date, Mozart's work was written nine years before Haydn's, the latter having been composed in 1787, and the former in 1778, Beethoven's having seen the light in 1812, the lapse of time between the "Jupiter" and the last but one of Beethoven's symphonies being 34 years.

Speaking of the Haydn symphony, the programme book says that in it the form is already fully established, as it well might be, when it is considered that when it was first played the three great symphonies of Mozart had been in existence nearly a decade.

On the whole, the "Jupiter" received the best treatment at the hands of Mr. Paur last evening. It was perfectly read and exquisitely played. The opening allegro of the Haydn symphony seemed to be taken at too rapid a pace for the due presentation of its characteristic effect, while the finale was given in a rapid tempo, at which it is very doubtful if the players of the composer's time could have performed it. The Haydn gayety was there, but something of the Haydn color was missing. The joyous and graceful Beethoven work, except for an unaccustomed excess of fire and possibly of roughness in the minuet, was charmingly interpreted.

Mr. Pourtau, in the trio of the minuet, rendered the difficult clarinet passage with exquisite clearness and with incomparable purity and delicacy of tone. The allegretto scherzando was given in a manner that emphasized its piquancy with delightful effect. There was much applause for both Mr. Paur and the orchestra.

The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished symphony, Schubert; aria from "Orpheus," Gluck; selections from suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; Wagner's songs, "Traeume" and "Schmerzen," and overture, "Carneral," Dvorak. The soloist is to be Mrs. Josephine Jacoby.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1898.

Twentieth Symphony Concert Program.

The program for the 20th symphony was of the most substantial character, the selections comprising Haydn's G major symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" and Bethoven's eighth symphonies. There was no soloist. The familiar works were interpreted in an admirable manner, the orchestra responding with promptness and sympathy to Mr Paur's guiding baton. The second movement in the Haydn symphony deserves special mention for the masterly work of the oboe and cellos, supplemented by the beautiful musical arabesques of the strings. The minuet and trio was given with charming simplicity, and no fault need be found with the brilliancy of the final movement.

Mozart's C major symphony, generally called "Jupiter," does not justify its sub title when compared with more modern works, especially those of the Russian school; but its tone colors are vivid and not the diabolical representations of writers of the present advanced style of descriptive music, and the beauties of the composition are undeniable, the lighter portions of the symphony being specially melodic and brilliant. The selection was played most effectively by the orchestra. The triumphant measures of Beethoven's eighth were heard with evident pleasure by the large audience. The humorous tick-tack of the second movement and the hilarious fourth part awakened most hearty plaudits, as usual. The orchestra work throughout was as buoyant, sympathetic and harmonious as one could desire.

Mrs Josephine Jacoby will be the soloist this week. The program will be as follows: Schubert, unfinished symphony; Gluck, Aria from "Orpheus"; Grieg, selections "Peer Gynt"; Wagner, songs with pianoforte; Dvorak, overture, "Carneval."

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twentieth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given last evening in Music Hall, consisted of the symphonies: Haydn in G major No. 3, Mozart in C major (Jupiter) and Beethoven in F major No. 8, op. 93.

The programme for the next rehearsal and concert includes Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor; Grieg's "Peer Gynt," suite No. 2, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. Mrs. Josephine Jacoby will be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 3, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Program Made Up Exclusively of Symphonies Which Were for the Most Part Coarsely Played.

The program of the 20th Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G major (B. & H. No. 13) Haydn
Symphony, "Jupiter"...................Mozart
Symphony No. 8.......................Beethoven

Let us not waste space in reasoning together concerning the character of the program, which to me was a senseless, intolerable freak. Let us consider for a moment the performance.

It was unfortunate for the orchestra that it made its reappearance after a trip on which, as I am told, it covered itself with glory, with a program of this nature. For in the present condition of the orchestra such symphonies show as in clear noon its weaknesses, and do not bring out its indisputable strength. Mr. Paur is far more successful in his treatment of works of the romantic school than in his treatment of such works as the symphonies chosen last night.

In each of these symphonies, and especially in the eighth of Beethoven, there were frequent instances of a lack of finesse, and more than once there was utter disregard of the composer's indicated intentions. Take, for instance, the last dozen measures of the first movement of the eighth symphony: There was no attempt to make a diminuendo in the wood wind, there was no pianissimo at the end, there were no dynamic gradations between strings and wind, there were no effects of color. The whole of the allegretto was coarse and heavy. There was not the slightest pretence of a steady staccato pianissimo of the oboes, clarinets, bassoons and horns that furnish the accompaniment, nor were expression marks regarded at all in measures that are most carefully marked. In the trio of the menuetto the horns and the first clarinet afforded a delightful relief to the stolidity of the performance as a whole. Again in the finale (page 40 of Peters's edition) what an Olympian contempt for the indication "sempre pianissimo"!

And in the symphonies that preceded there was constant exaggeration in accentuation, there was apparent inability to carry out a phrase with sustained softness, there was a constant confounding of forte with fortissimo. Mr. Paur is too inclined to leap from piano to fortissimo; he does not appear to be fond of intermediate gradations; he frequently anticipates a climax, and the result is unmeaning explosiveness.

Even in moments of the exhibition of strength there should be the suggestion of reserve force.

Just as the symphony by Hadyn—and are there not others by him that well deserve a hearing?—was without real elegance or distinction, so the fugue in the symphony by Mozart was often without sense of proportion, and where there should have been clear polyphony there was a noisy blur.

Far be it from me to disparge the merits of the individual players or the splendor of the ensemble in works of the romantic school. The virtuosity of this orchestra is at times dazzling. But there is also a virtuosity in performances of the classics, and in the present condition of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the virtuosity that we have a right to expect does not always appear when the symphony is by Mozart or Haydn; it does not always appear when the symphony is by Beethoven. Surely the great masters of the past demand as much intelligence in the reading and as much intelligence and pains in the rehearsing as do the interesting or extravagant composers of the present day.

Philip Hale.

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.
BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3.

An orchestral concert, given as only the Boston Symphony Orchestra know how to give, was enjoyed by an immense concourse of music lovers at the Metropolitan Opera House on Thursday evening, March 24. With regret we say adieu to the superb organization, for we shall not look upon its like again, until another musical era dawns upon us. The program was composed entirely of the music of the great masters, Beethoven and Wagner, and wonderful were the interpretations of the beautiful Ninth Symphony, the overture to "Leonore," the "Rienzi" prelude, the "Siegfried" Idyll, the prelude to the second act of "Lohengrin," the prelude and finale of "Tristan und Isolde," and the "Ride of the Valkyries." Never before have I heard the latter number given with such electrifying brilliancy and faultless precision. Truly, like angels' visits, are the concerts given us by the greatest symphonic orchestra in our country, led by Mr. Paur, and called the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1898.

Mr. Paur's annual programme of three symphonies in historical array was assigned to last night's concert and consisted of Haydn in G, Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's eighth. There is little to be said beyond the record, for neither of these works makes any extreme demand upon the capacity of the band, and when it is said that more calmness of spirit and emphasis would have well become some isolated pages of the earlier works, there is no exception to be taken.

At the next concert the orchestra will play Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, a part of Grieg's second "Peer Gynt" suite, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture. A stranger here, Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, will sing, her selections being only less aged than Mrs. Henschels's. They are the "Che faro," from Gluck's "Orpheus," and Wagner's "Taume" and "Schmerzen."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 4, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13; Peters, No. 8).
Mozart: Symphony No. 49, in C major, "Jupiter."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93.

Three classical symphonies on the same programme are enough to frighten some people. But the bark of such a programme is worse than its bite. We own that we had our misgivings beforehand, and heard some excellent musicians express theirs, too. It was not so much the mere fact of there being three symphonies—nor that of the symphonies being by Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, without any admixture of more modern matter—that was objected to, as that of Mozart's "Jupiter" coming in the middle. It was feared that Beethoven's eighth would sound trivial and gustless after that tremendous finale of the "Jupiter"; nothing, it was said, short of Beethoven's great C minor could hold its own after that matchless fugued movement of Mozart's. We ourselves half shared this fear, although we certainly had considerable faith in the power of the first phrase of Beethoven's eighth to snatch the listener out of any possible previous mood, and throw him immediately into its own.

Well! the proof of the pudding is in the eating; and we, who can report only on the test of our own palate, got such keen, unalloyed, absolute enjoyment out of the concert that it would be sheer artistic pusillanimity on our part to allow any theoretical considerations of right or wrong, fit or unfit, wise or the reverse, to weaken our expression of that enjoyment. Like the noble Kentuckian at the French table d'hote, who exclaimed: "I like pie, and I don't care who else does n't!" we found ourselves, for once, quite oblivious of what the rest of the audience might think about the three symphonies; in plain English, we had the best time we have had at a symphony concert this season.

There was the admirable symphony by Haydn, with its divinely beautiful Largo, its spicy minuet and inimitable nimble finale; one of the most perfect symphonies the old master ever wrote. Then Mozart's ever-great "Jupiter," as perfect on its higher plane, with its wider scope, of emotion as Haydn's on its lower level; more vigorous in conception, with a stronger hand at the bellows, more intense in feeling and poetic in imagination; bespeaking a higher cast of genius. And then, after Mozart's finale had swept you up to the loftiest regions even his mighty genius ever reached—save perhaps in some passages of "Don Giovanni" or the "Zauberflöte"—came that sudden summons to joyfulness in the opening phrase of Beethoven's eighth! Greater than Mozart's "Jupiter?" not by any means, if perhaps as great in another way; but more subtile, at once more sly and more profound, more essentially modern; the laughing silver edge of a thunder-cloud that persistently turns its silver toward you, so bright and alluring that you forget for the moment its potentiality of thunder. What a stroke of genius that opening phrase is! was there ever anything more irresistible in all music? anything more immediately overmastering, that claimed you more imperatively for its own? That phrase belongs to the lost arts; it came into the world copyrighted by the grace of God, with a copyright that will never run out. And how Beethoven keeps the whole symphony up to its level! Here is a hymn to all the sly, mocking, laughing deities and graces that will ever seek its fellow.

No, we cannot see how the programme could have been better arranged. On the printed page it looked a trifle "historical"; but he must have been a sad-minded man indeed who could think of anything so dry as history while listening to it. It was a programme to be drunk in, to be revelled in, like fine old claret, Bergundy and champagne—and no headache next day!

The reading and performance of the three masterpieces was, for the most part, so capital that we felt no impulse to pick a flaw here and there, based on difference of opinion. Where supreme contentment reigns, one would be foolish to be troubled by trifles.

The next programme is: Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Gluck, aria from "Orphée"; Grieg, selections from suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt"; Wagner, songs with pianoforte, "Träume," and "Schmerzen"; Dvorak, overture, "Carnival," opus 92. Mrs. Josephine Jacoby will be the singer.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1898.

Will the vacancies made by the lamented death of Mr. Seidl affect the future of Mr. Emil Paur?

His contract with Mr. Higginson expires this month. He does not know whether it will be renewed. I doubt whether Mr. Higginson himself knows. Meanwhile Mr. Paur, thus awkwardly situated, has declined more than one offer from abroad.

Who will succeed him here if he is not his own successor?

There are several rumors. I give them to you merely as floating gossip.

The man desired by some of the friends and members of the orchestra is Hans Richter. They say that he does not wish to come for any sum less than $20,000 a season. Does Mr. Higginson raise hands to heaven in commercial and prudent protest? There is this argument: "But double the number of concerts of your orchestra in New York. Richter's name will be a strong box-office magnet. Give more concerts outside of Boston."

Mr. Gericke stated about a year ago to a friend of mine in Germany that he should be happy to return as conductor.

Although the critics and the audiences of foreign cities agree in valuing Felix Weingartner as a man of indisputable ability, the "cabinet" of advice in Boston does not wish him here. Richter is older, and no doubt he would be more lenient in rehearsals.

Mention the name of Mottl and you are told that he is insane. Richard Strauss? "Impossible."

And pray why should not Mr. Paur stay if he is willing to endure the Boston climate and the rustle of analytical programs, containing cheerful facts about "conclusion themes?"

Some say that he may be offered an engagement for two years, the term of concerts to be played in the present shabby, uncomfortable and dangerous Music Hall.

Some go so far as to hint that Mr. Higginson's business interest in the orchestra will cease at the expiration of these two years.

* * *

I do not know Mr. Paur intimately. I never met him until this season; I have had only a few minutes' conversation with him. For I hold an old-fashioned and perhaps mistaken idea that as long as a critic is obliged to ply his trade it is better for him to meet as seldom as possible any man or woman concerning whom he may be obliged to write. I do not like to eat with a man and soon afterward feel it my duty to cut his throat with the knife of hospitality. As for women—singers, pianists, fiddlers, composers, &c.—I may say with Sir Thomas Browne, "I speak not in prejudice, nor am averse from that sweet sex, but naturally amorous of all that is beautiful." At the same time I repeat at night and in the morning the sage precept, "Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts." I believe that I have quoted this precept before—in THE MUSICAL COURIER and in sundry other papers. It is advice that cannot be pondered upon too often or too earnestly. But this is a digression.

Personally I am not prejudiced for or against Mr. Paur. As a man he seems to me to be an honest, unaffected, unspoiled, independent man, whose whole soul is in his work. Unless I am greatly mistaken he wishes to be accepted or rejected in accordance with his work as a conductor. He is another musician whose tongue is not candied to "lick absurd pomp," who does not know how to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning." He recognizes no superior claim of social patron or patroness—and why should he?

Of course a man of this straightforward, independent character will necessarily make enemies. Some will disparage him openly. Some will smile in his face and hold a snicker-snee behind the back, ready to carve him. One musician may say, "He does not play any of my works; therefore he is a wretched conductor." A fashionable woman may say, "He is not polished," and immediately the parasites attending her will yap viciously at his heels. It is my belief that the great majority of concert-goers in this city have an unfeigned respect as well as liking for Mr. Paur, conductor and man.

He is human.

He has his weaknesses, his faults. His programs are often clumsily arranged, and yet how seldom you find an ideal program in any city. Even Mr. Thomas, who was once a master of this difficult art, appears to me to have lost his peculiar cunning.

And I say frankly that I seldom like Mr. Paur's reading of a symphony by Haydn or Mozart. I much prefer him in modern and romantic works.

* * *

Last night, for instance, the program of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13)	Haydn
Symphony, Jupiter	Mozart
Symphony No. 8	Beethoven

By the way, the "Jupiter" symphony was written in 1788—not 1778, as Mr. Apthorp stated in the program-book. Let us not dispute about chronology or chronological interest in programs. Such programs seem to me intolerable.

Now, these symphonies were played for the most part coarsely, without due sense of proportion, without sufficient attention to dynamic indications. I could cite chapter and verse where important indications made by the composer were disregarded with Olympian indifference. Nearly everything was heard in exaggeration. There were hardly any gradations between piano and fortissimo. Forte was almost always fortissimo. There was over-accentuation. The symphony by Haydn was without distinction; the fugue-finale of the "Jupiter" was too often a noisy blur, instead of clear and flowing polyphony, and the Eighth Symphony was for the most part thumped out. Unfortunately we know by late experience that works by Mozart admit of beautiful and more musical treatment.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Schubert's "heavenly length" is added to by taking him at a very slow pace he becomes rather prolix. The "Unfinished Symphony" as performed on Saturday was an example in point; it dragged its slow themes along with extreme deliberation, the "moderato" of the first allègro being strongly insisted on and the "con moto" of the second movement being abolished. But the work was very clearly given, without technical flaw of any kind, and the wind instruments, and Schubert gives these great prominence in both brass and woodwind, were excellently played.

This symphony, or fragment of a symphony, is a good example of a composer having a definite channel of musical thought; Beethoven, for example, always had the orchestra in mind when composing large works, and as a result, his C sharp minor quartette, his B flat piano sonata Op. 106, and many other similar compositions, are orchestral works in disguise; Schumann had the piano almost always in his mind, and therefore, even in his greatest orchestral works, one finds clumps of chords in progressions that suggest that instrument; Schubert thought in song and therefore in his unfinished symphony and in the yet greater C major symphony we have, not real symphonic themes fitted for thematic treatment a la Beethoven or Brahms, but beautiful vocal melodies which could be easily turned into songs by the addition of fitting words. The charm, therefore, in such a symphony as the present one, is not in the intellectual process of evolving a development but in the contrast afforded by beautiful tunes of an eminently vocal character. This is a method that is easily comprehended by everybody with a spark of musical instinct and it was but natural that the suave and well-shaded performance should meet with a very hearty popular reception.

After the symphony came the soloist of the concert, Mme. Josephine Jacoby, a lady of most beautiful stage presence, graceful in the extreme, and gifted with a remarkably pure voice wedded to that quality, so rare in America, a clear enunciation. Her first number was the well-worn "Che faro senza Euridice," sung in Italian. There was something of calm deliberation here, and the phrasing was new in some of its touches, but in spite of the evident reserve the number made a good effect. The surety of intonation and the breadth of the final climax were highly to be commended. The singer was twice recalled with hearty applause.

The calmness and reserve noted in "Che Faro" wholly disappeared in the performance of two Wagner songs which Madame Jacoby gave later in the concert. These were finely accompanied by Mr. Paur himself. "Traeume" was sung in a beautiful manner and with an ease that had its peculiar charm. Mme. Jacoby's noble voice is very equal in its registers, she is always true in intonation, and when a degree of passionate abandon shall have been attained she will take very high rank.

Grieg set incidental music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt," Bizet similarly gave tonal expression to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne;" from each of these musical settings a beautiful suite was made, and in each case after this first harvesting an aftermath was collected in the shape of a second suite; the second suite in each case was like second-best butter or second-best eggs, to be viewed with suspicious toleration. In the second suite from "Peer Gynt," played at this concert, the "Song of Solvejg" was the one perfect number, and in its delicate shading, in the charming unity of the muted violins, one found a poetry that was absent from the other numbers. We are sure that no other orchestra in America could equal the ensemble which was displayed in this number, it was like a magnified solo.

The other movements of the suite dealt largely in eccentricity; the "Arabic Dance" only suggested reminiscences of the Midway Plaisance, with its yoking together of piccolo and bass-drum, and its employment of tambourines, triangle, and all other gypsy effects known to the modern composer by the misnomer of "Turkish Music." The dance of the daughter of the Mountain King took us from the Midway directly into the circus; here there were explosions that suggested that the gnomes understood the use of dynamite. The xylophone made its appearance prominently in this dance. This trashy instrument is generally ostracized from symphony concerts; it is a set of wooden slabs struck with a wooden mallet. The spinet was once characterized as "a scratch with a tone at the end of it;" the xylophone may be described a knock with a tone hidden in it. Only in one other symphonic concert work do we recall this vulgar instrument, in the morbid "Danse Macabre" by St. Saens the great French composer properly employs this rapping instrument to picture the knocking together of the bones of the skeletons as they indulge in their frenzied dance, a very fitting employment of the xylophone, for no other instrument would have produced the tone-color required. But in this dance the instrument only seems to add to the eccentricity of the composition without giving a proper passport to the domain of a classical orchestra.

With Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture the concert ended; one could not help comparing the work with Berlioz's better known carnival,—to the disadvantage of Dvorak. There was more noise and less romance here than in the "Carnaval Romaine." The Bohemian composer scores with a master hand; his instrumentation is brilliant and very seldom experimental; but the musical ideas grow less original as his opus number grows larger; it is possible that he writes too much.

Of course Mr. Paur caught up all the great crescendo effects with avidity and worked up the final climax with ardor, but this finale seemed only an Offenbach cancan in disguise. The work seemed brilliant but it gleamed with a brass-band brilliancy rather than with a symphonic scintillation.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 100.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Schubert Masterpiece Given with Exquisite Finish.

Mr. Paur and the Orchestra Acquit Themselves with Rare Merit in the Production of the unfinished Symphony—Mme. Jacoby, the Soloist of the Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, presented the following selections:

Unfinished symphony	Schubert
"Che faro senza Eurydice"	Gluck
Suite No. 2 from Peer Gynt	Grieg
"Traume" and "Schmerzen"	Wagner
Overture, "Carnival"	Dvorak

The soloist was Mme. Josephine Jacoby.

The programme was well arranged and excellent in its contrasts. Mr. Paur has never given a more beautiful reading to the Schubert symphony than he gave last evening, nor has the orchestra played with more exquisite finish this season than it did in this work.

The performance was a delight in every regard, and in nothing more than in the deep poetic feeling and the graceful warmth of color that pervaded it. No finer sympathy with Schubert can be easily imagined than was present in the interpretation from beginning to end.

The second of the Peer Gynt suites is scarcely as interesting as the first; in fact, it is little else than a display of the composer's skill in instrumentation, and this is forced to the front somewhat too obtrusively, but the barren weakness of the themes left no other resource than to resort to imparting interest to them by an elaboration of tone color. An exception must be made, however, for "Solvejg's Song," with its tender melody and its delicate orchestration; and this was given charmingly. The reading and playing of the suite throughout was full of character, and in the more vigorous numbers admirable in its rhythmic emphasis.

The Dvorak overture is not lacking in brilliancy and fire, but it cannot rank among the composer's successes. It seems to wander to and fro aimlessly, without any central point on which the attention can fasten itself, and has very much the effect of sound and fury, signifying nothing in particular beyond a thorough mastery of modern orchestral resources. It was splendidly and stirringly played.

Mme. Jacoby has an imposing stage presence. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic contralto of great sonority and large compass, very full and rich in its lower notes and pure and of velvety smoothness through its whole range. The artist uses it with skill; her intonation is perfect, and she sings broadly and well.

Unfortunately, her style is dry, rigid and uninteresting, and was a cause for surprise that so beautifully warm a voice could be used with so cold and so disappointing an effect as it was. The familiar Gluck aria was rendered with a stiffness that was suggestive of a carefully and mechanically conned lesson, and without pathos and color. The singing was perfect, but it was lifeless. Both of the Wagner songs, which were accompanied on the piano by Mr. Paur, were sung with singular tameness, and proved quite ineffective.

In brief, Mme. Jacoby, gifted as she is with a superb voice that shows every evidence of admirable training, seems to have paid little attention to finer essentials of style. She should be at great pains to remedy this neglect, for otherwise she is well equipped to take a foremost place in her art. The audience received her warmly, applauded her generously, and recalled her after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; concerto No. 1, for pianoforte, Tschaikowsky; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Unfinished Symphony, B minor	Schubert
Recitative and Aria from "Orpheus"	Gluck
Suite No. 2 from music to "Peer Gynt" Op. 55	Grieg
Songs: "Traume" and "Schmerzen"	Wagner
Overture, "Carneval"	Dvorak

Soloist: Mme. Josephine Jacoby.

The instrumental novelty of the evening was the Grieg suite, and it hardly calls for special notice; it is light, pleasant music, effectively scored and with the descriptive text there is little difficulty in understanding what it was intended to describe. That it is programme music is not its fault; that it should have been extracted from the place where it belongs is a pity; for when musical instruments attempt to tell a story, there is no Rosetta stone by which their meaning can be interpreted, and the makeshift of an explanatory preface is kindly meant, but cruelly unsatisfactory. In this suite Peer Gynt runs away with a bride, carries her up to the mountain peaks and leaves her, as the programme informs us, "to roam about with cowherd girls." But so far as the music is concerned there are large lapses in Peer's life. He abducts the bride in two-four time, and we next hear of him as a spectator of the dancing of the mountain King's daughter in two-four time. Then he wanders to foreign countries, and next appears as a spectator of an Arab dance. Then there is a blank, until he next appears as an old man and listens to a very delightful song. This is the order of events in the explanatory preface to the work; but in the order of events as told by the orchestra, Peer's age gets mixed up, and his appearance as a ship-wrecked old man precedes his appearance as a mocking young man. This is confusing to those who follow the music with their fingers on the explanatory text. From the musical side, the work is pleasantly stimulating; and it gave great pleasure to the audience. It was interpreted with admirable effect and spirit by the orchestra. Of Mr. Paur's noble reading of the noble unfinished symphony it is hardly necessary to write; it was a large, dignified and finished interpretation, delightful to listen to and to remember.

Mme. Josephine Jacoby has a beautiful contralto voice, and in the Gluck recitative and aria it was heard to great advantage, though in the latter portion of the aria she hurried the time to the spoiling of the pathos and dignity of the work. The Wagner songs were sung with much earnestness. The artist made a most favorable impression, but it is impossible to class her with the great singers.

The programme for the next concert is Brahms' Symphony, No. 1, Brahams; Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, Tschaikowsky; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. The soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.
(Copyright 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening included Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor; recitative and aria from "Orpheus," by Gluck; suite No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55, by Grieg; songs, "Traume" and "Schmerzen," Wagner, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, op. 92.

Mrs. Josephine Jacoby was the soloist. The Schubert symphony was played by the orchestra with great clearness and surety. This work never for a moment loses any of its charm. It is one of the especial favorites of our symphony patrons, and in the work Schubert shows himself as the most natural of any of the masters. Grieg's second suite to "Peer Gynt," while much inferior in musical value to his first suite, still has points of interest and in this work, notably in the fifth movement, the composer has introduced some unusual effects of orchestral color, in the combination of piano, harp, triangle, xylophone and snare drum, with the rhythm of the accompaniment played by the strings struck with the wood of the bow. The effect is tricky and not easy to describe. In this work the orchestra did wonders. A fine performance of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture completed the programme. Mrs. Jacoby has a very fine contralto voice, which has a great volume of tone, and she uses it always with expression and good taste. Her singing was in every way admirable, and she received several recalls after both of her selections. At the next rehearsal and concert Mr. Joseffy will be with us again, and he will play Tschaikowsky's concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, a work which (if memory is correct) he has never played here before. Brahms's symphony No. 1 and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" are also promised.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. The concluding concert of this series will be given Thursday evening, April 28, the programme including Beethoven's third symphony and various Wagner selections.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6, 1898.

Will the vacancies made by the lamented death of Mr. Seidl affect the future of Mr. Emil Paur?

His contract with Mr. Higginson expires this month. He does not know whether it will be renewed. I doubt whether Mr. Higginson himself knows. Meanwhile Mr. Paur, thus awkwardly situated, has declined more than one offer from abroad.

Who will succeed him here if he is not his own successor?

There are several rumors. I give them to you merely as floating gossip.

The man desired by some of the friends and members of the orchestra is Hans Richter. They say that he does not wish to come for any sum less than $20,000 a season. Does Mr. Higginson raise hands to heaven in commercial and prudent protest? There is this argument: "But double the number of concerts of your orchestra in New York. Richter's name will be a strong box-office magnet. Give more concerts outside of Boston."

Mr. Gericke stated about a year ago to a friend of mine in Germany that he should be happy to return as conductor.

Although the critics and the audiences of foreign cities agree in valuing Felix Weingartner as a man of indisputable ability, the "cabinet" of advice in Boston does not wish him here. Richter is older, and no doubt he would be more lenient in rehearsals.

Mention the name of Mottl and you are told that he is insane. Richard Strauss? "Impossible."

And pray why should not Mr. Paur stay if he is willing to endure the Boston climate and the rustle of analytical programs, containing cheerful facts about "conclusion themes?"

Some say that he may be offered an engagement for two years, the term of concerts to be played in the present shabby, uncomfortable and dangerous Music Hall.

Some go so far as to hint that Mr. Higginson's business interest in the orchestra will cease at the expiration of these two years.

* * *

I do not know Mr. Paur intimately. I never met him until this season; I have had only a few minutes' conversation with him. For I hold an old-fashioned and perhaps mistaken idea that as long as a critic is obliged to ply his trade it is better for him to meet as seldom as possible any man or woman concerning whom he may be obliged to write. I do not like to eat with a man and soon afterward feel it my duty to cut his throat with the knife of hospitality. As for women—singers, pianists, fiddlers, composers, &c.—I may say with Sir Thomas Browne, "I speak not in prejudice, nor am averse from that sweet sex, but naturally amorous of all that is beautiful." At the same time I repeat at night and in the morning the sage precept, "Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest thou be taken with her attempts." I believe that I have quoted this precept before—in THE MUSICAL COURIER and in sundry other papers. It is advice that cannot be pondered upon too often or too earnestly. But this is a digression.

Personally I am not prejudiced for or against Mr. Paur. As a man he seems to me to be an honest, unaffected, unspoiled, independent man, whose whole soul is in his work. Unless I am greatly mistaken he wishes to be accepted or rejected in accordance with his work as a conductor. He is another musician whose tongue is not candied to "lick absurd pomp," who does not know how to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning." He recognizes no superior claim of social patron or patroness—and why should he?

Of course a man of this straightforward, independent character will necessarily make enemies. Some will disparage him openly. Some will smile in his face and hold a snicker-snee behind the back, ready to carve him. One musician may say, "He does not play any of my works; therefore he is a wretched conductor." A fashionable woman may say, "He is not polished," and immediately the parasites attending her will yap viciously at his heels. It is my belief that the great majority of concert-goers in this city have an unfeigned respect as well as liking for Mr. Paur, conductor and man.

He is human.

He has his weaknesses, his faults. His programs are often clumsily arranged, and yet how seldom you find an ideal program in any city. Even Mr. Thomas, who was once a master of this difficult art, appears to me to have lost his peculiar cunning.

And I say frankly that I seldom like Mr. Paur's reading of a symphony by Haydn or Mozart. I much prefer him in modern and romantic works.

* * *

Last night, for instance, the program of the twentieth Symphony concert was as follows:

Symphony in G major (B. & H., No. 13)........Haydn
Symphony, Jupiter..................................Mozart
Symphony No. 8..............................Beethoven

By the way, the "Jupiter" symphony was written in 1788—not 1778, as Mr. Apthorp stated in the program-book. Let us not dispute about chronology or chronological interest in programs. Such programs seem to me intolerable.

Now, these symphonies were played for the most part coarsely, without due sense of proportion, without sufficient attention to dynamic indications. I could cite chapter and verse where important indications made by the composer were disregarded with Olympian indifference. Nearly everything was heard in exaggeration. There were hardly any gradations between piano and fortissimo. Forte was almost always fortissimo. There was over-accentuation. The symphony by Haydn was without distinction; the fugue-finale of the "Jupiter" was too often a noisy blur, instead of clear and flowing polyphony, and the Eighth Symphony was for the most part thumped out. Unfortunately we know by late experience that works by Mozart admit of beautiful and more musical treatment.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 11, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

When Schubert's "heavenly length" is added to by taking him at a very slow pace he becomes rather prolix. The "Unfinished Symphony" as performed on Saturday was an example in point; it dragged its slow themes along with extreme deliberation, the "moderato" of the first allegro being strongly insisted on and the "con moto" of the second movement being abolished. But the work was very clearly given, without technical flaw of any kind, and the wind instruments, and Schubert gives these great prominence in both brass and woodwind, were excellently played.

This symphony, or fragment of a symphony, is a good example of a composer having a definite channel of musical thought; Beethoven, for example, always had the orchestra in mind when composing large works, and as a result, his C sharp minor quartette, his B flat piano sonata Op. 106, and many other similar compositions, are orchestral works in disguise; Schumann had the piano almost always in his mind, and therefore, even in his greatest orchestral works, one finds clumps of chords in progressions that suggest that instrument; Schubert thought in song and therefore in his unfinished symphony and in the yet greater C major symphony we have, not real symphonic themes fitted for thematic treatment a la Beethoven or Brahms, but beautiful vocal melodies which could be easily turned into songs by the addition of fitting words. The charm, therefore, in such a symphony as the present one, is not in the intellectual process of evolving a development but in the contrast afforded by beautiful tunes of an eminently vocal character. This is a method that is easily comprehended by everybody with a spark of musical instinct and it was but natural that the suave and well-shaded performance should meet with a very hearty popular reception.

After the symphony came the soloist of the concert, Mme. Josephine Jacoby, a lady of most beautiful stage presence, graceful in the extreme, and gifted with a remarkably pure voice wedded to that quality, so rare in America, a clear enunciation. Her first number was the well-worn "Che faro senza Euridice," sung in Italian. There was something of calm deliberation here, and the phrasing was new in some of its touches, but in spite of the evident reserve the number made a good effect. The surety of intonation and the breadth of the final climax were highly to be commended. The singer was twice recalled with hearty applause.

The calmness and reserve noted in "Che Faro" wholly disappeared in the performance of two Wagner songs which Madame Jacoby gave later in the concert. These were finely accompanied by Mr. Paur himself. "Traeume" was sung in a beautiful manner and with an ease that had its peculiar charm. Mme. Jacoby's noble voice is very equal in its registers, she is always true in intonation, and when a degree of passionate abandon shall have been attained she will take very high rank.

Grieg set incidental music to Ibsen's "Peer Gynt," Bizet similarly gave tonal expression to Daudet's "L'Arlesienne;" from each of these musical settings a beautiful suite was made, and in each case after this first harvesting an aftermath was collected in the shape of a second suite; the second suite in each case was like second-best butter or second-best eggs, to be viewed with suspicious toleration. In the second suite from "Peer Gynt," played at this concert, the "Song of Solvejg" was the one perfect number, and in its delicate shading, in the charming unity of the muted violins, one found a poetry that was absent from the other numbers. We are sure that no other orchestra in America could equal the ensemble which was displayed in this number, it was like a magnified solo.

The other movements of the suite dealt largely in eccentricity; the "Arabic Dance" only suggested reminiscences of the Midway Plaisance, with its yoking together of piccolo and bass-drum, and its employment of tambourines, triangle, and all other gypsy effects known to the modern composer by the misnomer of "Turkish Music." The dance of the daughter of the Mountain King took us from the Midway directly into the circus; here there were explosions that suggested that the gnomes understood the use of dynamite. The xylophone made its appearance prominently in this dance. This trashy instrument is generally ostracized from symphony concerts; it is a set of wooden slabs struck with a wooden mallet. The spinet was once characterized as "a scratch with a tone at the end of it;" the xylophone may be described a knock with a tone hidden in it. Only in one other symphonic concert work do we recall this vulgar instrument, in the morbid "Danse Macabre" by St. Saens the great French composer properly employs this rapping instrument to picture the knocking together of the bones of the skeletons as they indulge in their frenzied dance, a very fitting employment of the xylophone, for no other instrument would have produced the tone-color required. But in this dance the instrument only seems to add to the eccentricity of the composition without giving a proper passport to the domain of a classical orchestra.

With Dvorak's "Carnaval" overture the concert ended; one could not help comparing the work with Berlioz's better known carnival,—to the disadvantage of Dvorak. There was more noise and less romance here than in the "Carnaval Romaine." The Bohemian composer scores with a master hand; his instrumentation is brilliant and very seldom experimental; but the musical ideas grow less original as his opus number grows larger; it is possible that he writes too much.

Of course Mr. Paur caught up all the great crescendo effects with avidity and worked up the final climax with ardor, but this finale seemed only an Offenbach cancan in disguise. The work seemed brilliant but it gleamed with a brass-band brilliancy rather than with a symphonic scintillation.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 100.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Schubert Masterpiece Given with Exquisite Finish.

Mr. Paur and the Orchestra Acquit Themselves with Rare Merit in the Production of the unfinished Symphony—Mme. Jacoby, the Soloist of the Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, presented the following selections:

Unfinished symphony..................Schubert
"Che faro senza Eurydice"..............Gluck
Suite No. 2 from Peer Gynt..............Grieg
"Traume" and "Schmerzen"..........Wagner
Overture, "Carnival"..................Dvorak

The soloist was Mme. Josephine Jacoby.

The programme was well arranged and excellent in its contrasts. Mr. Paur has never given a more beautiful reading to the Schubert symphony than he gave last evening, nor has the orchestra played with more exquisite finish this season than it did in this work.

The performance was a delight in every regard, and in nothing more than in the deep poetic feeling and the graceful warmth of color that pervaded it. No finer sympathy with Schubert can be easily imagined than was present in the interpretation from beginning to end.

The second of the Peer Gynt suites is scarcely as interesting as the first; in fact, it is little else than a display of the composer's skill in instrumentation, and this is forced to the front somewhat too obtrusively, but the barren weakness of the themes left no other resource than to resort to imparting interest to them by an elaboration of tone color. An exception must be made, however, for "Solvejg's Song," with its tender melody and its delicate orchestration; and this was given charmingly. The reading and playing of the suite throughout was full of character, and in the more vigorous numbers admirable in its rhythmic emphasis.

The Dvorak overture is not lacking in brilliancy and fire, but it cannot rank among the composer's successes. It seems to wander to and fro aimlessly, without any central point on which the attention can fasten itself, and has very much the effect of sound and fury, signifying nothing in particular beyond a thorough mastery of modern orchestral resources. It was splendidly and stirringly played.

Mme. Jacoby has an imposing stage presence. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic contralto of great sonority and large compass, very full and rich in its lower notes and pure and of velvety smoothness through its whole range. The artist uses it with skill; her intonation is perfect, and she sings broadly and well.

Unfortunately, her style is dry, rigid and uninteresting, and was a cause for surprise that so beautifully warm a voice could be used with so cold and so disappointing an effect as it was. The familiar Gluck aria was rendered with a stiffness that was suggestive of a carefully and mechanically conned lesson, and without pathos and color. The singing was perfect but it was lifeless. Both of the Wagner songs, which were accompanied on the piano by Mr. Paur, were sung with singular tameness, and proved quite ineffective.

In brief, Mme. Jacoby, gifted as she is with a superb voice that shows every evidence of admirable training, seems to have paid little attention to finer essentials of style. She should be at great pains to remedy this neglect, for otherwise she is well equipped to take a foremost place in her art. The audience received her warmly, applauded her generously, and recalled her after each effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; concerto No. 1, for pianoforte, Tschaikowsky, overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. Mr. Rafael Joseffy is to be the soloist.

SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-first concert of the Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Unfinished Symphony, B minor......Schubert
Recitative and Aria from "Orpheus"...Gluck
Suite No. 2 from music to "Peer Gynt"
Op. 55...............................Grieg
Songs: "Traume" and "Schmerzen". Wagner
Overture, "Carneval"..................Dvorak
Soloist: Mme. Josephine Jacoby.

The instrumental novelty of the evening was the Grieg suite, and it hardly calls for special notice; it is light, pleasant music, effectively scored and with the descriptive text there is little difficulty in understanding what it was intended to describe. That it is programme music is not its fault; that it should have been extracted from the place where it belongs is a pity; for when musical instruments attempt to tell a story, there is no Rosetta stone by which their meaning can be interpreted and the makeshift of an explanatory preface is kindly meant, but cruelly unsatisfactory. In this suite Peer Gynt runs away with a bride, carries her up to the mountain peaks and leaves her, as the programme informs us, "to roam about with cowherd girls." But so far as the music is concerned there are large lapses in Peer's life. He abducts the bride in two-four time, and we next hear of him as a spectator of the dance of the mountain King's daughter in two-four time. Then he wanders to foreign countries, and next appears as a spectator of an Arab dance. Then there is a blank, until he next appears as an old man and listens to a very delightful song. This is the order of events in the explanatory preface to the work; but in the order of events as told by the orchestra, Peer's age gets mixed up, and his appearance as a ship-wrecked old man precedes his appearance as a mocking young man. This is confusing to those who follow the music with their fingers on the explanatory text. From the musical side, the work is pleasantly stimulating; and it gave great pleasure to the audience. It was interpreted with admirable effect and spirit by the orchestra. Of Mr. Paur's noble reading of the noble unfinished symphony it is hardly necessary to write; it was a large, dignified and finished interpretation, delightful to listen to and to remember.

Mme. Josephine Jacoby has a beautiful contralto voice, and in the Gluck recitative and aria it was heard to great advantage, though in the latter portion of the aria she hurried the time to the spoiling of the pathos and dignity of the work. The Wagner songs were sung with much earnestness. The artist made a most favorable impression, but it is impossible to class her with the great singers.

The programme for the next concert is Brahms' Symphony, No. 1, Brahms; Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, Tschaikowsky; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven. The soloist will be Mr. Rafael Joseffy.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 10.

(Copyright 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the twenty-first concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening included Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor; recitative and aria from "Orpheus," by Gluck; suite No. 2, from the music to "Peer Gynt," op. 55, by Grieg; songs, "Traume" and "Schmerzen," Wagner, and Dvorak's "Carnival" overture, op. 92.

Mrs. Josephine Jacoby was the soloist. The Schubert symphony was played by the orchestra with great clearness and surety. This work never for a moment loses any of its charm. It is one of the especial favorites of our symphony patrons, and in the work Schubert shows himself as the most natural of any of the masters. Grieg's second suite to "Peer Gynt," while much inferior in musical value to his first suite, still has points of interest and in this work, notably in the fifth movement, the composer has introduced some unusual effects of orchestral color, in the combination of piano, harp, triangle, xylophone and snare drum, with the rhythm of the accompaniment played by the strings struck with the wood of the bow. The effect is tricky and not easy to describe. In this work the orchestra did wonders. A fine performance of Dvorak's "Carnival" overture completed the programme. Mrs. Jacoby has a very fine contralto voice, which has a great volume of tone, and she uses it always with expression and good taste. Her singing was in every way admirable, and she received several recalls after both of her selections. At the next rehearsal and concert Mr. Joseffy will be with us again, and he will play Tschaikowsky's concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, a work which (if memory is correct) he has never played here before. Brahms's symphony No. 1 and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" are also promised.

Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra last Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. The concluding concert of this series will be given Thursday evening, April 28, the programme including Beethoven's third symphony and various Wagner selections.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, Contralto, Made Her First Appearance in Music Hall.

The program of the 21st Symphony concert, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor	Schubert
"I Have Lost My Eurydice"	Gluck
Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt" I. Ingrid's Lament. II. Arabian Dance. IV. Solvejg's Song. V. Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter.	Grieg
"Traeume"	Wagner
"Schmerzen"	Wagner
Overture "Carnival"	Dvořák

There was no orchestral novelty. The first movement of the symphony was taken at too slow a pace—especially was this true of the second theme and its development—and for once the music seemed long drawn out. The overture by Dvořák was played brilliantly, but the music is decorative; it is plausible, and without any true authority. Nor is this second suite from Grieg's music to Ibsen's play as interesting or of as much intrinsic worth as are the pieces in the more familiar suite. When Suite No. 2 was first performed here under Mr. Nikisch five years or so ago, "Peer Gynt's Return" was played, and it then became apparent that the hero took passage on the good ship, the Flying Dutchman. Solvejg's song, which has been sung here often, is beautiful in its white and passionless lamentation. With this exception the music in a concert-hall excites chiefly surprise and an unholy interest in percussion instruments. General Booth is in town—perhaps the Arabian Dance was performed in his honor.

⁂

Mrs. Jacoby is a strikingly handsome woman—and with a singer this is half the battle. She suggests the sombre, mysterious charm of the Queen of Night in Mozart's opera, but the Creator was wiser than Mozart and he gave her a contralto voice. This voice is a wondrous organ. The tones are velvety, warm; they remind you of purples and softly radiant precious stones. And this voice is used with much technical skill.

Mrs. Jacoby sang the familiar aria from "Orpheus," which, as an ingenious Frenchman, pointed out long ago, might as well be "I have found my Euridice," as far as the character of the music is concerned. She sang it in Italian—although Mr. Apthorp had carefully provided the readers of the program-book with the German text. She sang it admirably in respect to technic and tonal quality. I wish that she were acquainted with Pauline Viardot's interpretation, which is preserved in the Ecole classique du Chant, edited by that great singer. The first exposition of the theme is with Viardot, mezzo forte, without nuance of any kind. The first repetition is piano throughout, until the end of that repetition, when the pianissimo is employed. Beginning with the final repetition, the air is given forth with full voice, "tout l'élan possible," and the tempo is quickened until the final measure. I do not say that this is the only interpretation—but it surely gives variety and an irresistible climax. The songs, so-called, of Wagner are better suited to the drawing-room than the concert-hall. Mrs. Jacoby was applauded heartily.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

Mme Josephine Jacoby, a contralto singer, new to this city, achieved a great success at last week's symphony concerts. Her numbers were a recitative and aria from "Orpheus," and Richard Wagner's musical settings of the songs "Dreams" and "Sorrows." Mme Jacoby is a woman of striking personal appearance and her voice is one of the richest contraltos heard in this city in a long time. She sings easily and naturally, her tones are unusually rich and resonant and the quality is even throughout her register. Her performance came in the nature of a surprise to many in the audience, as the artist had come here without any advance heralding of her powers; and to the majority of auditors she was a stranger. Her voice is of exceptional quality and she uses it very effectively and without a semblance of forcing the tones.

The lament of Orpheus was sung with splendid dramatic power, the opening phrases illustrating the despair of the lover in a manner which instantly aroused attention and the anticipations of a sympathetic presentation of the excerpt. The whole number was grandly declaimed and sung, and suggested the possible enjoyment of "Orpheus" in operatic form, with Mme Jacoby as the hero. The two Wagner songs were also notable contributions, the work of the artist calling forth demonstrative plaudits and many returns to the platform. Conductor Paur played the piano accompaniments to the songs.

The orchestral numbers were Schubert's unfinished symphony, four movements of the suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt," and Dvorak's "Carneval" overture. The familiar selections call for no special mention about their interpretations. The delicate and plaintive measures of the Schubert work were given with the usual grace and daintiness, "Peer Gynt" lacked nothing in tone colors or bizarre effects, and the joyous "Carneval" was brilliantly and sympathetically treated.

The celebrated pianist, Rafael Joeffy, will be this week's soloist. The program will be as follows: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, Tschaikowsky; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven.

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was as follows:

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Gluck: Recitative and Aria, "Che faro senza Euridice" from Orfeo ed Euridice."
Grieg: Four movements from Suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt," opus 55.
Wagner: Songs with Pianoforte: "Träume" and "Schmerzen."
Dvorak: Overture, "Carnaval," opus 92.
Mme. Josephine Jacoby was the singer.

Not the most interesting programme in the world! Schubert's unfinished symphony is a great work; this is pretty generally admitted. But the second movement, with all its beauty of material, is enormously spun out—according to the composer's unfortunate bent for prolixity—and it must come very fresh to one, after years of silence, not to seem dull and tedious as a whole. Now, the curious fact is that this is the fourth consecutive year in which Mr. Paur has given this unfinished symphony of Schubert's; and it does not come fresh to us at all. Other longish works, by the way, have been played this season which were also given last winter. Strongly as we advocate giving important new works over again at short intervals, we must say that it seems a mistake to give any familiar classic two seasons running; indeed, we should prefer an interval of two seasons between the giving and repeating of any standard repertory work.

Grieg's second suite from his "Peer Gynt" music is hardly up to the standerd of the first. The Andante of Solvejg's Song is undeniably charming in its quaint, exotic turns of the phrase and romantic melancholy; but it is, upon the whole, rather a flimsy production, and we doubt if it will prove to be in fast colors. But this is the only movement in the suite that seems to have anything to recommend it; the others are dull enough. The fantastic instrumentation of the Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter—which movement was given last Saturday without the full quota of instruments—may be interesting to the connoisseur once, but surely not twice.

Dvorak's "Carnaval" seems pretty poor stuff, now that we have heard it more than once; it is of the sort of music that gets nowhere and says nothing.

Mme. Jacoby has a rich, unctuous contralto, of rather veiled timbre, but even in quality throughout a considerable compass. She sings technically well, and in excellent tune. Her stage-presence is majestic and commanding. But, to judge from what she did last Saturday evening, she lacks the inner fire. She sang the Gluck aria in a wisely chosen tempo than one often hears it; taking the principal Andante con moto not too slow for contrast with the Adagio episodes. But she sang the wonderful melody rather rigidly, without emotion or dramatic climax, and it must be admitted that the aria did not produce much effect. It should be noted, too, that Mme. Jacoby had a curiously rich collections of pronunciations of the name "Euridice." In the Wagner songs, which were conducted by Mr. Paur, she occasionally sang a phrase very beautifully indeed; but such stray flashes could not illumine the whole of either of the songs; they fell pretty flat, if the truth be told. After all, one wonders why people care to sing any of Wagner's songs in jublic. "Schmerzen" is the only one of the set of five that approaches real excellence; "Träume" has moments of imaginative beauty, but it is irritating to compare it with the passage in "Tristan" for which it was a preliminary study—and the comparison forces itself upon one irresistibly. Wagner was great enough in other ways to be pardonable for not being a great, or even a good song-writer; but there is no need of showing him at his weakest before an audience.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68, Tchaikovsky, pianoforte concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, opus 23; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont," opus 84. Mr. Rafael Joseffy will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

Seventy-sixth year—Vol. LIV. No. 10.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1898.

The Kneisel Concert.

The eighth and last concert of this, the thirteenth season of the Kneisel Quartet, was given in Association Hall last evening, Mme. Szumowska-Adamowski assisting. The programme was as follows: Quartet, A minor, op. 132, Beethoven; quatrtet, piano and strings, in B-flat, op. 41, Saint-Saens; quartet, No. 2, in D, Borodine.

The above programme shows that it was a case of where the best shall have first position. Nothing short of the well-known ability of this quartet kept the concert last evening from being as it were top heavy. After such a masterly interpretation of Beethoven's great quartet with its many difficulties, as has come to be expected of the Kneisel people, it was, perhaps, but natural that Saint-Saens quartet, one of his most effective compositions, should seem a trifle tame. Mme. Adamowski was warmly applauded upon her entrance, and immediately won still greater applause by her exquisite playing.

The Borodine quartet was given in a way which seemed to possess it with many new musical beauties, and made even a better impression than at earlier hearings.

The excellence of the programme, the soloist, coming directly after the Lenten season, and above all, the fact that it was the closing concert of the season, brought out such an audience as nothing short of this famous quartet can bring out. Seldom has Association Hall held a more enthusiastic audience; applause reigned throughout the evening, being particularly noticeable at the close of the concert.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

Seventy-sixth year—Vol. LIV. No. 9.

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1898.

The Symphony.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; 21st concert. Mme. Josephine Jacoby, coloist. The programme:

Unfinished symphony	Schubert
"Che faro senza Eurydice"	Gluck
Suite No. 2 from Peer Gynt	Grieg
"Traume" and "Schmerzen"	Wagner
Overture, "Carnival"	Dvorak

This was not a concert of novelty, of emotional thrill, nor of startling brilliancy, but it was notable for the especially fine playing of the orchestra, which seemed keyed up to its most dazzling pitch. The "Unfinished" was given exquisitely in every portion, and its beautiful interpretation showed anew the ability and sympathy of Mr. Paur as a reader of Schubert. The "Peer Gynt" suite, No. 2, while neither so generally interesting nor truly music as the more familiar one, surpasses anything it can offer in a single movement, the lovely, poetic and beautifully orchestrated "Solvejg's Song." For the rest, it is mostly a rather amusing exhibit of the odd things in musical (?) instruments, and for once the irrepressible kettle-drummer was not a nuisance. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture suffered in being placed within two or three weeks of Berlioz' magnificent "Roman Carnival." The Bohemian's work seems tame, purposeless and diffuse in comparison with the Frenchman's. It is of the eminently respectable, well-made order of composition, but nothing more. Its playing was practically flawless.

Mme. Jacoby has the happy combination of a fine and attractive stage presence and a large, rich and flexible contralto voice. She sings easily, tastefully and with good method, but—and if it were not for this reservation she would come pretty near to greatness—she lacks that something we rather feebly try to define as "soul." In other words, you admire her vocal work, but are not affected by the spirit of her singing. Her limitations were most conspicuously shown in the Wagner songs, which were wholly ineffective. Evidently she has not at all the style for "lieder." In the Gluck aria she accomplished much better things. She is vocally fine, and I do not believe that she lacks temperament. Only it is somehow not allowed to assert itself.

WILDER T. QUINT.

Big Money In Orchestras.

A paragraph which appeared in New York Life recently contains an interesting admission of New York's inferiority to Boston as a musical center.

"Why is it that the Boston Symphony orchestra gives us so little of their most improving society? Their audiences are the very best we can furnish, both in numbers and in culture. Our pleasure is always mingled with regret that this splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country, should favor us so rarely.

"Cannot we induce them to come and live with us and go to Boston only when they feel like it?"

If New York had a citizen like Banker Higginson of Boston willing to spend $200,000 in the support of an orchestra, or a group of public spirited citizens like the guarantors of the Thomas orchestra in Chicago, possibly New York could have a pre-eminent musical organization. But in New York the attempt to maintain a symphony orchestra has never been more than partially successful, because both Damrosch and Seidl have been left to support their own orchestral organizations or to make them self supporting, which is a most difficult undertaking.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1898

Association Hall: The Kneisel Quartet

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mme. Antoinette Szumowska-Adamowska, gave the eighth, and last, concert of this, its thirteenth, season, in Association Hall last evening, the programme being:

Beethoven: Quartet in A minor, opus 132.
Saint-Saëns: Quartet for Pianoforte and Strings, in B-flat major, opus 41.
Borodine: Quartet No. 2, in D major.

This being the programme, the three numbers were unquestionably arranged in the proper order; but it would have been better if they had not been advertised in just the inverse order, for some subscribers, much interested in the Beethoven quartet and little interested in the Borodine, were misled thereby into coming late, and thus losing one or two movements of the Beethoven.

Beethoven's A minor quartet—the one with the "Canzona di ringraziamento in modo lidico" in the third movement—is assuredly one of the greatest productions of human genius. One is tempted to compare it, if only for its greatness, with the one in C-sharp minor, opus 131; but the two works are very different, and a comparison between them does not come to much. The ecstatic mood in which the C-sharp minor begins is maintained almost throughout the A minor; but the expression is more fitful, often more passionate; the whole thing, save in the "Lydian Song" itself, is more unbridled and, in a sense, more irregular. The difficulties of the work are great; the mere technical difficulty of the thing makes it more than a match for many a quartet of players; then its abstruseness renders it one of the severest intellectual and artistic tasks in all instrumental music. In this respect it may well be compared to the great B-flat major pianoforte sonata, opus 106. But a worthy performance can let the listener fathom its abstruseness—which is, after all, not the abstruseness of incomplete or awkward expression but that of real profundity of thought; the music seems abstruse, not because the composer did not fully realize just whither he was going, but because of the domain of thought and emotion into which he leads us. Play it right, and it becomes clear as day. Hardly anywhere has Beethoven soared to loftier heights of ecstasy or dived down to profounder depths of feeling than in this wondrous composition; if ever he was entirely great, he is so here. And, with all this, how absolutely naïf the music is; nowhere does it betray the slightest self-consciousness, the mere vulgar pride in displaying emotion. There is not a trace of tail-lashing in it; the feeling is as genuine and true as it is deep and exalted, the expression complete. Last evening's performance by the Kneisels fairly passed belief; not only were the difficulties of the work, technical and otherwise, well conquered, but conquered so completely that the four artists could play it, not merely with accuracy, beauty of tone, and perfection of ensemble, but with abandon, with inspiration and poetic afflatus. Such a performance of such a work makes a date in the musical history of our city.

What Saint-Saëns's B-flat pianoforte quartet might have seemed like, had it not immediately followed this stupendous inspiration of Beethoven's, is not quite clear to us; but we much fear that it made little difference. The composition seemed to us thoroughly poor and vapid; we could hardly find a musical idea, let alone an inspiration, in all the four movements. There is an enormous amount of elaborate work in it, of a sort; seldom has even Saint-Saëns been more resolutely and inveterately contrapuntal. But it is the mere carcass of counterpoint, with the soul fled. Strange that a man of Saint-Saëns's calibre and attainments should have studied Sebastian Bach with all the reverence and energy he did, and have got so little real good from it! When he tries to follow Bach contrapuntally, he is as dry as sawdust; so soon as he makes his counterpoint effective, he writes like Meyerbeer. One may surmise that it will take another generation or two to take the Meyerbeer grease-spot quite out of French music. Certainly nothing was lacking in the performance of this quartet: Mme. Szumowska played the pianoforte part exquisitely, with infinite grace and beauty of phrasing, with her own charm in the lighter florid passages, with the fine fire and vigor in the stronger ones. Messrs. Kneisel, Svecenski and Schroeder, too, were fully up to the mark. And here, by the way, was a fine instance of a fully open pianoforte doing the strings no injury whatever.

Borodine's D major quartet, which the Kneisels have played here before, has much that is charming in it. The first movement is rather weak and amateurish—while one instrument has the phrase, the three others are marking time on a merely harmonic accompaniment. But the second and third movements are full of light, breezy fascination. The finale is probably the most original part of the work; although we think the workmanship none of the best. The composer does not seem quite to have clinched his idea.

And so ends the greatest quartet season Boston has ever had. Au revoir!

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1898.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, Contralto, Made Her First Appearance in Music Hall.

The program of the 21st Symphony concert, Mr. Emil Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor...Schubert
"I Have Lost My Eurydice"............Gluck
Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt"..............Grieg
  I. Ingrid's Lament.
  II. Arabian Dance.
  IV. Solvejg's Song.
  V. Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter.
"Traeume"............................ Wagner
"Schmerzen"........................... Wagner
Overture "Carnival"...................Dvorák

There was no orchestral novelty. The first movement of the symphony was taken at too slow a pace—especially was this true of the second theme and its development—and for once the music seemed long drawn out. The overture by Dvorák was played brilliantly, but the music is decorative; it is plausible, and without any true authority. Nor is this second suite from Grieg's music to Ibsen's play as interesting or of as much intrinsic worth as are the pieces in the more familiar suite. When Suite No. 2 was first performed here under Mr. Nikisch five years or so ago, "Peer Gynt's Return" was played, and it then became apparent that the hero took passage on the good ship, the Flying Dutchman. Solvejg's song, which has been sung here often, is beautiful in its white and passionless lamentation. With this exception the music in a concert-hall excites chiefly surprise and an unholy interest in percussion instruments. General Booth is in town—perhaps the Arabian Dance was performed in his honor.

⁂

Mrs. Jacoby is a strikingly handsome woman—and with a singer this is half the battle. She suggests the sombre, mysterious charm of the Queen of Night in Mozart's opera, but the Creator was wiser than Mozart and he gave her a contralto voice. This voice is a wondrous organ. The tones are velvety, warm; they remind you of purples and softly radiant precious stones. And this voice is used with much technical skill.

Mrs. Jacoby sang the familiar aria from "Orpheus," which, as an ingenious Frenchman, pointed out long ago, might as well be "I have found my Euridice," as far as the character of the music is concerned. She sang it in Italian—although Mr. Apthorp had carefully provided the readers of the program-book with the German text. She sang it admirably in respect to technic and tonal quality. I wish that she were acquainted with Pauline Viardot's interpretation, which is preserved in the Ecole classique du Chant, edited by that great singer. The first exposition of the theme is with Viardot, mezzo forte, without nuance of any kind. The first repetition is piano throughout, until the end of that repetition, when the pianissimo is employed. Beginning with the final repetition, the air is given forth with full voice, "tout l'élan possible," and the tempo is quickened until the final measure. I do not say that this is the only interpretation—but it surely gives variety and an irresistible climax. The songs, so-called, of Wagner are better suited to the drawing-room than the concert-hall. Mrs. Jacoby was applauded heartily.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

Mme Josephine Jacoby, a contralto singer, new to this city, achieved a great success at last week's symphony concerts. Her numbers were a recitative and aria from "Orpheus," and Richard Wagner's musical settings of the songs "Dreams" and "Sorrows." Mme Jacoby is a woman of striking personal appearance and her voice is one of the richest contraltos heard in this city in a long time. She sings easily and naturally, her tones are unusually rich and resonant and the quality is even throughout her register. Her performance came in the nature of a surprise to many in the audience, as the artist had come here without any advance heralding of her powers, and to the majority of auditors she was a stranger. Her voice is of exceptional quality and she uses it very effectively and without a semblance of forcing the tones.

The lament of Orpheus was sung with splendid dramatic power, the opening phrases illustrating the despair of the lover in a manner which instantly aroused attention and the anticipations of a sympathetic presentation of the excerpt. The whole number was grandly declaimed and sung, and suggested the possible enjoyment of "Orpheus" in operatic form, with Mme Jacoby as the hero. The two Wagner songs were also notable contributions, the work of the artist calling forth demonstrative plaudits and many returns to the platform. Conductor Paur played the piano accompaniments to the songs.

The orchestral numbers were Schubert's unfinished symphony, four movements of the suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt," and Dvorak's "Carneval" overture. The familiar selections call for no special mention about their interpretations. The delicate and plaintive measures of the Schubert work were given with the usual grace and daintiness, "Peer Gynt" lacked nothing in tone colors or bizarre effects, and the joyous "Carneval" was brilliantly and sympathetically treated.

The celebrated pianist, Rafael Joeffy, will be this week's soloist. The program will be as follows; Symphony No. 1, Brahms; concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, Tschaikowsky; overture, "Egmont," Beethoven.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-first Symphony concert was as follows:

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Gluck: Recitative and Aria, "Che faro senza Euridice" from Orfeo ed Euridice."
Grieg: Four movements from Suite No. 2 from "Peer Gynt," opus 55.
Wagner: Songs with Pianoforte: "Träume" and "Schmerzen"
Dvorak: Overture, "Carnaval," opus 92.
Mme. Josephine Jacoby was the singer.

Not the most interesting programme in the world! Schubert's unfinished symphony is a great work; this is pretty generally admitted. But the second movement, with all its beauty of material, is enormously spun out—according to the composer's unfortunate bent for prolixity—and it must come very fresh to one, after years of silence, not to seem dull and tedious as a whole. Now, the curious fact is that this is the fourth consecutive year in which Mr. Paur has given this unfinished symphony of Schubert's; and it does not come fresh to us at all. Other longish works, by the way, have been played this season which were also given last winter. Strongly as we advocate giving important new works over again at short intervals, we must say that it seems a mistake to give any familiar classic two seasons running; indeed, we should prefer an interval of two seasons between the giving and repeating of any standard repertory work.

Grieg's second suite from his "Peer Gynt" music is hardly up to the standerd of the first. The Andante of Solvejg's Song is undeniably charming in its quaint, exotic turns of the phrase and romantic melancholy; but it is, upon the whole, rather a flimsy production, and we doubt if it will prove to be in fast colors. But this is the only movement in the suite that seems to have anything to recommend it; the others are dull enough. The fantastic instrumentation of the Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter—which movement was given last Saturday without the full quota of instruments—may be interesting to the connoisseur once, but surely not twice.

Dvorak's "Carnaval" seems pretty poor stuff, now that we have heard it more than once; it is of the sort of music that gets nowhere and says nothing.

Mme. Jacoby has a rich, unctuous contralto, of rather veiled timbre, but even in quality throughout a considerable compass. She sings technically well, and in excellent tune. Her stage-presence is majestic and commanding. But, to judge from what she did last Saturday evening, she lacks the inner fire. She sang the Gluck aria in a wisely chosen tempo than one often hears it; taking the principal Andante con moto not too slow for contrast with the Adagio episodes. But she sang the wonderful melody rather rigidly, without emotion or dramatic climax, and it must be admitted that the aria did not produce much effect. It should be noted, too, that Mme. Jacoby had a curiously rich collections of pronunciations of the name "Euridice." In the Wagner songs, which were conducted by Mr. Paur, she occasionally sang a phrase very beautifully indeed; but such stray flashes could not illumine the whole of either of the songs; they fell pretty flat, if the truth be told. After all, one wonders why people care to sing any of Wagner's songs in jublic. "Schmerzen" is the only one of the set of five that approaches real excellence; "Träume" has moments of imaginative beauty, but it is irritating to compare it with the passage in "Tristan" for which it was a preliminary study—and the comparison forces itself upon one irresistibly. Wagner was great enough in other ways to be pardonable for not being a great, or even a good song-writer; but there is no need of showing him at his weakest before an audience.

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68, Tchaikovsky, pianoforte concerto No. 1, in B-flat minor, opus 23; Beethoven, overture to "Egmont," opus 84. Mr. Rafael Joseffy will be the pianist.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

Seventy-sixth year—Vol. LIV. No. 10.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1898.

The Kneisel Concert.

The eighth and last concert of this, the thirteenth season of the Kneisel Quartet, was given in Association Hall last evening, Mme. Szumowska-Adamowski assisting. The programme was as follows: Quartet, A minor, op. 132, Beethoven; quatrtet, piano and strings, in B-flat, op. 41, Saint-Saens; quartet, No. 2, in D, Borodius.

The above programme shows that it was a case of where the best shall have first position. Nothing short of the well-known ability of this quartet kept the concert last evening from being as it were top heavy. After such a masterly interpretation of Beethoven's great quartet with its many difficulties, as has come to be expected of the Kneisel people, it was, perhaps, but natural that Saint-Saens quartet, one of his most effective compositions, should seem a trifle tame. Mme. Adamowski was warmly applauded upon her entrance, and immediately won still greater applause by her exquisite playing.

The Borodine quartet was given in a way which seemed to possess it with many new musical beauties, and made even a better impression than at earlier hearings.

The excellence of the programme, the soloist, coming directly after the Lenten season, and above all, the fact that it was the closing concert of the season, brought out such an audience as nothing short of this famous quartet can bring out. Seldom has Association Hall held a more enthusiastic audience; applause reigned throughout the evening, being particularly noticeable at the close of the concert.

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

Seventy-sixth year—Vol. LIV. No. 9.

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1898.

The Symphony.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; 21st concert. Mme. Josephine Jacoby, coloist. The programme:

Unfinished symphony...............Schubert
"Che faro senza Eurydice"...........Gluck
Suite No. 2 from Peer Gynt..........Grieg
"Traume" and "Schmerzen"......Wagner
Overture, "Carnival"...................Dvorak

This was not a concert of novelty, of emotional thrill, nor of startling brilliancy, but it was notable for the especially fine playing of the orchestra, which seemed keyed up to its most dazzling pitch. The "Unfinished" was given exquisitely in every portion, and its beautiful interpretation showed anew the ability and sympathy of Mr. Paur as a reader of Schubert. The "Peer Gynt" suite, No. 2, while neither so generally interesting nor truly music as the more familiar one, surpasses anything it can offer in a single movement, the lovely, poetic and beautifully orchestrated "Solvejg's Song." For the rest, it is mostly a rather amusing exhibit of the odd things in musical (?) instruments, and for once the irrepressible kettle-drummer was not a nuisance. Dvorak's "Carnival" overture suffered in being placed within two or three weeks of Berlioz' magnificent "Roman Carnival." The Bohemian's work seems tame, purposeless and diffuse in comparison with the Frenchman's. It is of the eminently respectable, well-made order of composition, but nothing more. Its playing was practically flawless.

Mme. Jacoby has the happy combination of a fine and attractive stage presence and a large, rich and flexible contralto voice. She sings easily, tastefully and with good method, but—and if it were not for this reservation she would come pretty near to greatness—she lacks that something we rather feebly try to define as "soul." In other words, you admire her vocal work, but are not affected by the spirit of her singing. Her limitations were most conspicuously shown in the Wagner songs, which were wholly ineffective. Evidently she has not at all the style for "lieder." In the Gluck aria she accomplished much better things. She is vocally fine, and I do not believe that she lacks temperament. Only it is somehow not allowed to assert itself.

WILDER T. QUINT.

Big Money In Orchestras.

A paragraph which appeared in New York Life recently contains an interesting admission of New York's inferiority to Boston as a musical center.

"Why is it that the Boston Symphony orchestra gives us so little of their most improving society? Their audiences are the very best we can furnish, both in numbers and in culture. Our pleasure is always mingled with regret that this splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country, should favor us so rarely.

"Cannot we induce them to come and live with us and go to Boston only when they feel like it?"

If New York had a citizen like Banker Higginson of Boston willing to spend $200 000 in the support of an orchestra, or a group of public spirited citizens like the guarantors of the Thomas orchestra in Chicago, possibly New York could have a pre-eminent musical organization. But in New York the attempt to maintain a symphony orchestra has never been more than partially successful, because both Damrosch and Seidl have been left to support their own orchestral organizations or to make them self supporting, which is a most difficult undertaking.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1898

Association Hall: The Kneisel Quartet

The Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mme. Antoinette Szumowska-Adamowska, gave the eighth, and last, concert of this, its thirteenth, season, in Association Hall last evening, the programme being:

Beethoven: Quartet in A minor, opus 132.
Saint-Säens: Quartet for Pianoforte and Strings, in B-flat major, opus 41.
Borodine: Quartet No. 2, in D major.

This being the programme, the three numbers were unquestionably arranged in the proper order; but it would have been better if they had not been advertised in just the inverse order, for some subscribers, much interested in the Beethoven quartet and little interested in the Borodine, were misled thereby into coming late, and thus losing one or two movements of the Beethoven.

Beethoven's A minor quartet—the one with the "Canzona di ringraziamento in modo lidico" in the third movement—is assuredly one of the greatest productions of human genius. One is tempted to compare it, if only for its greatness, with the one in C-sharp minor, opus 131; but the two works are very different, and a comparison between them does not come to much. The ecstatic mood in which the C-sharp minor begins is maintained almost throughout the A minor; but the expression is more fitful, often more passionate; the whole thing, save in the "Lydian Song" itself, is more unbridled and, in a sense, more irregular. The difficulties of the work are great; the mere technical difficulty of the thing makes it more than a match for many a quartet of players; then its abstruseness renders it one of the severest intellectual and artistic tasks in all instrumental music. In this respect it may well be compared to the great B-flat major pianoforte sonata, opus 106. But a worthy performance can let the listener fathom its abstruseness—which is, after all, not the abstruseness of incomplete or awkward expression but that of real profundity of thought; the music seems abstruse, not because the composer did not fully realize just whither he was going, but because of the domain of thought and emotion into which he leads us. Play it right, and it becomes clear as day. Hardly anywhere has Beethoven soared to loftier heights of ecstasy or dived down to profounder depths of feeling than in this wondrous composition; if ever he was entirely great, he is so here. And, with all this, how absolutely naif the music is; nowhere does it betray the slightest self-consciousness, the mere vulgar pride in displaying emotion. There is not a trace of tail-lashing in it; the feeling is as genuine and true as it is deep and exalted, the expression complete. Last evening's performance by the Kneisels fairly passed belief; not only were the difficulties of the work, technical and otherwise, well conquered, but conquered so completely that the four artists could play it, not merely with accuracy, beauty of tone, and perfection of ensemble, but with abandon, with inspiration and poetic afflatus. Such a performance of such a work makes a date in the musical history of our city.

What Saint-Saëns's B-flat pianoforte quartet might have seemed like, had it not immediately followed this stupendous inspiration of Beethoven's, is not quite clear to us; but we much fear that it made little difference. The composition seemed to us thoroughly poor and vapid; we could hardly find a musical idea, let alone an inspiration, in all the four movements. There is an enormous amount of elaborate work in it, of a sort; seldom has even Saint-Saëns been more resolutely and inveterately contrapuntal. But it is the mere carcass of counterpoint, with the soul fled. Strange that a man of Saint-Saëns's calibre and attainments should have studied Sebastian Bach with all the reverence and energy he did, and have got so little real good from it! When he tries to follow Bach contrapuntally, he is as dry as sawdust; so soon as he makes his counterpoint effective, he writes like Meyerbeer. One may surmise that it will take another generation or two to take the Meyerbeer grease-spot quite out of French music. Certainly nothing was lacking in the performance of this quartet: Mme. Szumowska played the pianoforte part exquisitely, with infinite grace and beauty of phrasing, with her own charm in the lighter florid passages, with the fine fire and vigor in the stronger ones. Messrs. Kneisel, Svecenski and Schroeder, too, were fully up to the mark. And here, by the way, was a fine instance of a fully open pianoforte doing the strings no injury whatever.

Borodine's D major quartet, which the Kneisels have played here before, has much that is charming in it. The first movement is rather weak and amateurish—while one instrument has the phrase, the three others are marking time on a merely harmonic accompaniment. But the second and third movements are full of light, breezy fascination. The finale is probably the most original part of the work; although we think the workmanship none of the best. The composer does not seem quite to have clinched his idea.

And so ends the greatest quartet season Boston has ever had. Au revoir!

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13 1898.

THE program of the twenty-first Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor	Schubert
I Have Lost My Euridice	Gluck
Suite No. 2, Peer Gynt	Grieg
I. Ingrid's Lament.
II. Arabian Dance.
IV. Solvejg's Song.
V. Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter.
Songs with piano accompaniment—
Träume	Wagner
Schmerzen	Wagner
Overture, Carnival	Dvorák

Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, of New York, made her first appearance in Boston at these concerts.

I had seen her before—not on the stage, but in Thomas Hardy's description of Eustacia Vye.

"To see her hair was to fancy that a whole winter did not contain darkness enough to form its shadow. It closed over her forehead like night-fall extinguishing the western glow. * * * She had pagan eyes, full of nocturnal mysteries. Their light, as it came and went, and came again, was partially hampered by their oppressive lids and lashes, and of these, the under-lid was much fuller than it usually is with English women. * * * Her presence brought memories of Bourbon roses, jacinths and rubies, a tropical midnight, an eclipse of the sun, a portent; her moods recaller lotus-eaters, the march in 'Athalie,' the Commination Service; her motions, the ebb and flow of the sea; her voice, the viola. In a dim light, and with a slight rearrangement of hair, her general figure might have stood for that of either the higher female deities."

The voice of Mrs. Jacoby is, indeed, a noble organ, and even were this singer like unto Persiani, who was "pale, plain, anxious," who "had resigned every question of personal attraction as a hopeless one," the voice itself would command immediately respectful attention and soon excite hearty applause. For the voice is rich, sumptuous, purple. The singer is mistress of it; it obeys her.

* * *

Perhaps it is because the end of an abundant season is fast approaching, perhaps my impression was the inevitable result of the performance; it seemed to me that the first movement of the symphony by Schubert dragged its course and was for once tiresome. Surely the second theme, with its development, was taken too deliberately, too consciously. The tune dripped tears of sensibility; and as Vernon Blackburn said lately of Plunket Greene, "Tears of sensibility are good on occasion; but shed too lavishly they are apt to be tiresome." I seldom hear this theme taken fast enough. I remember a dispute in Berlin years ago over this very point. Joachim, who was then conducting some orchestral concerts—this was somewhere in '82-'84—had asked the opinions of several musicians. The slowest pace suggested by any one was faster than that chosen last night, and no disputant claimed that there should be any touch of sentimentalism.

The music of Grieg and Dvorák was played with dash and brilliance, and when there was occasion for subdued emotion, as in Solvejg's song, the orchestra was emotional without exaggeration.

The second suite from the music to Ibsen's play is chiefly music of theatrical character in which the element of surprise dominates. General Booth was in town yesterday. I hope he heard the "Arabian Dance"; for it is well suited to the service of the Salvation Army and a word from it would put it in the repertory. This overture—Carnival overture of Dvorák—opens with spirit, and then you discover that after all it is merely decorative music. You could be persuaded easily to talk while it were played, and you would not miss any important thought or keen observation of the composer.

Jacoby's Boston Triumph.

MRS. JOSEPHINE S. JACOBY, the contralto, sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—and followed up her previous successes of the season with a veritable vocal triumph at Music Hall. The record made by Mrs. Jacoby as an American and American taught concert and oratorio singer is unprecedented in the history of song in this country, and stands as a verification of the platform that demands recognition of home talent and home resources. It also proves that the people here will recognize native talent and merit provided it is the genuine article. We produce some extracts of the local criticisms:

Madame Jacoby has an imposing stage presence. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic contralto of great sonority and large compass, very full and rich in its lower notes, and pure and of velvety smoothness through its whole range. The artist uses it with skill; her intonation is perfect, and she sings broadly and well.—Boston Herald, April 10.

After the symphony came the soloist of the concert, Mme. Josephine Jacoby, a lady of most beautiful stage presence, graceful in the extreme, and gifted with a remarkably pure voice wedded to that quality, so rare in America, a clear enunciation. Her first number was the well-worn "Che faro senza Euridice," sung in Italian. There was something of calm deliberation here, and the phrasing was new in some of its touches, but in spite of the evident reserve the number made a good effect. The surety of intonation and the breadth of the final climax were highly to be commended. The singer was twice recalled with hearty applause. * * * The calmness and reserve noted in "Che Faro" wholly disappeared in the performance of two Wagner songs which Madame Jacoby gave later in the concert. These were finely accompanied by Mr. Paur himself. "Traeume" was sung in a beautiful manner and with an ease that had its peculiar charm. Madame Jacoby's noble voice is very equal in its registers; she is always true in intonation, and when a degree of passionate abandon shall have been attained she will take very high rank.—Boston Advertiser, April 11.

Mrs. Jacoby is a strikingly handsome woman, and with a singer this is half the battle. She suggests the sombre, mysterious charm of the Queen of Night in Mozart's opera; but the Creator was wiser than Mozart, and he gave her a contralto voice. This voice is a wondrous organ. The tones are velvety, warm; they remind you of purples and softly radiant precious stones. And this voice is used with much technical skill.—Boston Journal, April 10.

Mme. Josephine Jacoby, a contralto singer, new to this city, achieved a great success at last week's symphony concerts. Her numbers were a recitative and aria from "Orpheus," and Richard Wagner's musical settings of the songs "Dreams" and "Sorrows." Madame Jacoby is a woman of striking personal appearance, and her voice is one of the richest contraltos heard in this city in a long time. She sings easily and naturally, her tones are unusually rich and resonant, and the quality is even throughout her register. Her performance came in the nature of a surprise to many in the audience, as the artist had come here without any advance heralding of her powers, and to the majority of her auditors she was a stranger. Her voice is of exceptional quality, and she uses it very effectively and without a semblance of forcing tones.

The "Lament of Orpheus" was sung with fine dramatic power, the opening phrases illustrating the despair of the lover in a manner which instantly aroused attention and the anticipations of a sympathetic presentation of the excerpt. The whole number was grandly declaimed and sung, and suggested the possible enjoyment of "Orpheus" in operatic form, with Madame Jacoby as the hero. The two Wagner songs were also notable contributions, the work of the artist calling forth demonstrative plaudits and many returns to the platform. Conductor Paur played the piano accompaniments to the songs.—Boston Globe, April 10.

Madame Jacoby has a very fine contralto voice, which has a great volume of tone, and she uses it always with expression and good taste. Her singing was in every way admirable, and she received several recalls after both of her selections.—Boston Post, April 10.

Globe

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Programme and a Light Audience at the Academy.

The Symphony orchestra rendered a delightful programme last night. The only objection to the concert was that it was by far too short. The audience was the smallest that has ever assembled to pay its tribute to this most famed organization. The few hundred people who were present, however, heard the finest concert that has ever been given in this city, and this includes the knowledge of the delightful hours that the Symphony has given in past years.

Tschaikowsky's symphony "Pathetic" perhaps derives its title from the introductory and the last movement. It is a wonderful creation. Its interpretation by Emil Paur, was sympathetic and finished. The allegro vivace movement showed orchestration that was perfection, and called for especial recognition.

Ths Chabrier number, "Espana," was disappointing in that its exquisite phrasing and graceful theme too soon reached the end of this rhapsodic poem.

The "Tannhauser" overture was perhaps the favorite number in the programme, because it was the most familiar. Fall River audiences have heard this creation of Wagner with much more brass than last night, but never has the number been interpreted to show the pure melody and the great beauty of the masterpiece, as under the skillful direction of Mr. Paur.

Marion Titus was the soloist. The recitative and aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" allowed the singer to indicate the marvellous flexibility of her voice, but it was in the number from the "Pearl of Brazil" that Mrs Titus gave the audience the full benefit of her art. Her voice was perhaps a trifle deficient in power and lacked color, but her runs and trills were most remarkable, her enunciation perfect, and the climax of this very difficult number proved a voice of great range. The singer must have been very much flattered by the attention which the audience gave her, and the warm applause which was rendered. She was called out half a dozen times, to bow her acknowledgments to the assembly she had so charmed.

O. E. Borden's efforts in the direction of high class music are too well known to call for any compliments here. It is only to be regretted and sincerely so, that these efforts are not more liberally appreciated.

THE SYMPHONY.

A Small Audience but a Delightful Concert.

There was the smallest audience at the Academy Tuesday night that ever went there for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. In contrast, the program was one of the most pleasing ever given here by that organization. The audience was a select one of music loving people, but there must be many more people in the city who enjoy such music than were present, and it is to be regretted that a larger number did not turn out for the concert. Such a lack of support of high class musical entertainment will, if continued, shut this city off from such entertainment. The people who desire to hear the best of music will be compelled to go out of town to do so, and Fall River will lose its reputation as one of the few cities in addition to Boston, in New England, that can and do support music of the class of the symphony concerts.

The selections made for the program were as good as possible and their playing made the concert delightful. Conductor Paur's men were in the fullest sympathy with him, and it was one of those occasions when it seemed as though he might have had every instrument in the orchestra connected with his fingers, head, elbows or other parts of his body. The time was as nearly perfect as possible, and there was a richness and swing to the playing that did not require a musical education for appreciation. That every number was enjoyed was evident in the quick and hearty applause. The warm welcome given Mr. Emil Paur when he appeared indicated much regard for him and the orchestra among the people present.

Mrs. Marian Titus, the soloist, is probably as remarkable a singer in the capabilities of her voice as was ever heard here. Its compass is wonderful, and she carries it to a hight that only three or four other public singers can reach. Her voice is very flexible and so finely trained that every quality is used to the best advantage, and an only moderate power is not a disadvantage. In her first number Mrs. Titus illustrated more fully the capabilities of her voice, though in both numbers there were introduced wonderful runs in the high notes. In each she sang up to three or four notes above high C, the limit with which most soprano singers have to be satisfied. In a part of the recitative in her first number she sang in a distinctly contralto register. The singer had the audience with her from the first, being warmly greeted upon first coming out. She was called out four times after her first number and three or four times after the second. This second number "Charming Bird," from "The Pearl of Brazil," was the more pleasing as far as melody went.

The full program given was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B. Minor, "Pathetic," op. 74	Tschaikowsky.
I. Adagio.—Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegro con grazia.
III. Allegro molto vivace.
IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Recitative, "Non Paventar," and Aria "Infelice," from "Il Flauto magico	Mozart
Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana."	Chabrier
Couplets Du Mysoli, "Charmant oiseau," from la Perle du Bresil."	Felicien David
Overture, "Tannhaeuser."	Wagner

The symphony played is one of the newer ones and it has been very popular. It was played here by the Symphony two seasons ago, and was repeated last night by request. Special interest was attached to this symphony recently through the anouncement that it was a favorite of the late Anton Seidl. The adagio lamentoso was played at his funeral services in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. The rhapsody of Chabrier, as its title indicates, was a lively, stirring number and the audience was quick to appreciate the change from the preceding numbers. The overture from "Tannhaeuser" was of course popular. It probably more thoroughly pleased the audience as a whole than any of the previous numbers, a fact specially notable since it was the last number on the program. Everyone has heard something from this opera, and the one who does not enjoy it when well played is quite certain not to enjoy music at all. It is difficult to imagine the overture better played than it was last night, for the orchestra gave it with great spirit and in perfect accord. The audience stayed a minute or two to express its pleasure by applause.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13 1898.

THE program of the twenty-first Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, Emil Paur conductor, was as follows:

Unfinished Symphony in B minor..............Schubert
I Have Lost My Euridice........................Gluck
Suite No. 2, Peer Gynt...........................Grieg
  I. Ingrid's Lament.
  II. Arabian Dance.
  IV. Solvejg's Song.
  V. Dance of the Mountain King's Daughter.
Songs with piano accompaniment—
  Träume ....Wagner
  Schmerzen ....Wagner
  Overture, Carnival.........................Dvorák

Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, of New York, made her first appearance in Boston at these concerts.

I had seen her before—not on the stage, but in Thomas Hardy's description of Eustacia Vye.

"To see her hair was to fancy that a whole winter did not contain darkness enough to form its shadow. It closed over her forehead like night-fall extinguishing the western glow. * * * She had pagan eyes, full of nocturnal mysteries. Their light, as it came and went, and came again, was partially hampered by their oppressive lids and lashes, and of these, the under-lid was much fuller than it usually is with English women. * * * Her presence brought memories of Bourbon roses, jacinths and rubies, a tropical midnight, an eclipse of the sun, a portent; her moods recaller lotus-eaters, the march in 'Athalie,' the Commination Service; her motions, the ebb and flow of the sea; her voice, the viola. In a dim light, and with a slight rearrangement of hair, her general figure might have stood for that of either the higher female deities."

The voice of Mrs. Jacoby is, indeed, a noble organ, and even were this singer like unto Persiani, who was "pale, plain, anxious," who "had resigned every question of personal attraction as a hopeless one," the voice itself would command immediately respectful attention and soon excite hearty applause. For the voice is rich, sumptuous, purple. The singer is mistress of it; it obeys her.

* * *

Perhaps it is because the end of an abundant season is fast approaching, perhaps my impression was the inevitable result of the performance; it seemed to me that the first movement of the symphony by Schubert dragged its course and was for once tiresome. Surely the second theme, with its development, was taken too deliberately, too consciously. The tune dripped tears of sensibility; and as Vernon Blackburn said lately of Plunket Greene, "Tears of sensibility are good on occasion; but shed too lavishly they are apt to be tiresome." I seldom hear this theme taken fast enough. I remember a dispute in Berlin years ago over this very point. Joachim, who was then conducting some orchestral concerts—this was somewhere in '82-'84—had asked the opinions of several musicians. The slowest pace suggested by any one was faster than that chosen last night, and no disputant claimed that there should be any touch of sentimentalism.

The music of Grieg and Dvorák was played with dash and brilliance, and when there was occasion for subdued emotion, as in Solvejg's song, the orchestra was emotional without exaggeration.

The second suite from the music to Ibsen's play is chiefly music of theatrical character in which the element of surprise dominates. General Booth was in town yesterday. I hope he heard the "Arabian Dance"; for it is well suited to the service of the Salvation Army and a word from it would put it in the repertory. This overture—Carnival overture of Dvorák—opens with spirit, and then you discover that after all it is merely decorative music. You could be persuaded easily to talk while it were played, and you would not miss any important thought or keen observation of the composer.

Jacoby's Boston Triumph.

MRS. JOSEPHINE S. JACOBY, the contralto, sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week—Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—and followed up her previous successes of the season with a veritable vocal triumph at Music Hall. The record made by Mrs. Jacoby as an American and American taught concert and oratorio singer is unprecedented in the history of song in this country, and stands as a verification of the platform that demands recognition of home talent and home resources. It also proves that the people here will recognize native talent and merit provided it is the genuine article. We produce some extracts of the local criticisms:

Madame Jacoby has an imposing stage presence. Her voice is a warm and sympathetic contralto of great sonority and large compass, very full and rich in its lower notes, and pure and of velvety smoothness through its whole range. The artist uses it with skill; her intonation is perfect, and she sings broadly and well.—Boston Herald, April 10.

After the symphony came the soloist of the concert, Mme. Josephine Jacoby, a lady of most beautiful stage presence, graceful in the extreme, and gifted with a remarkably pure voice wedded to that quality, so rare in America, a clear enunciation. Her first number was the well-worn "Che faro senza Euridice," sung in Italian. There was something of calm deliberation here, and the phrasing was new in some of its touches, but in spite of the evident reserve the number made a good effect. The surety of intonation and the breadth of the final climax were highly to be commended. The singer was twice recalled with hearty applause. * * * The calmness and reserve noted in "Che Faro" wholly disappeared in the performance of two Wagner songs which Madame Jacoby gave later in the concert. These were finely accompanied by Mr. Paur himself. "Traeume" was sung in a beautiful manner and with an ease that had its peculiar charm. Madame Jacoby's noble voice is very equal in its registers; she is always true in intonation, and when a degree of passionate abandon shall have been attained she will take very high rank.—Boston Advertiser, April 11.

Mrs. Jacoby is a strikingly handsome woman, and with a singer this is half the battle. She suggests the sombre, mysterious charm of the Queen of Night in Mozart's opera; but the Creator was wiser than Mozart, and he gave her a contralto voice. This voice is a wondrous organ. The tones are velvety, warm; they remind you of purples and softly radiant precious stones. And this voice is used with much technical skill.—Boston Journal, April 10.

Mme. Josephine Jacoby, a contralto singer, new to this city, achieved a great success at last week's symphony concerts. Her numbers were a recitative and aria from "Orpheus," and Richard Wagner's musical settings of the songs "Dreams" and "Sorrows." Madame Jacoby is a woman of striking personal appearance, and her voice is one of the richest contraltos heard in this city in a long time. She sings easily and naturally, her tones are unusually rich and resonant, and the quality is even throughout her register. Her performance came in the nature of a surprise to many in the audience, as the artist had come here without any advance heralding of her powers, and to the majority of her auditors she was a stranger. Her voice is of exceptional quality, and she uses it very effectively and without a semblance of forcing tones.

The "Lament of Orpheus" was sung with fine dramatic power, the opening phrases illustrating the despair of the lover in a manner which instantly aroused attention and the anticipations of a sympathetic presentation of the excerpt. The whole number was grandly declaimed and sung, and suggested the possible enjoyment of "Orpheus" in operatic form, with Madame Jacoby as the hero. The two Wagner songs were also notable contributions, the work of the artist calling forth demonstrative plaudits and many returns to the platform. Conductor Paur played the piano accompaniments to the songs.—Boston Globe, April 10.

Madame Jacoby has a very fine contralto voice, which has a great volume of tone, and she uses it always with expression and good taste. Her singing was in every way admirable, and she received several recalls after both of her selections.—Boston Post, April 10.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Programme and a Light Audience at the Academy.

The Symphony orchestra rendered a delightful programme last night. The only objection to the concert was that it was by far too short. The audience was the smallest that has ever assembled to pay its tribute to this most famed organization. The few hundred people who were present, however, heard the finest concert that has ever been given in this city, and this includes the knowledge of the delightful hours that the Symphony has given in past years.

Tschaikowsky's symphony "Pathetic" perhaps derives its title from the introductory and the last movement. It is a wonderful creation. Its interpretation by Emil Paur, was sympathetic and finished. The allegro vivace movement showed orchestration that was perfection, and called for especial recognition.

Ths Chabrier number, "Espana" was disappointing in that its exquisite phrasing and graceful theme too soon reached the end of this rhapsodic poem.

The "Tannhauser" overture was perhaps the favorite number in the programme, because it was the most familiar. Fall River audiences have heard this creation of Wagner with much more brass than last night, but never has the number been interpreted to show the pure melody and the great beauty of the masterpiece, as under the skillful direction of Mr. Paur.

Marion Titus was the soloist. The recitative and aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute" allowed the singer to indicate the marvellous flexibility of her voice, but it was in the number from the "Pearl of Brazil" that Mrs Titus gave the audience the full benefit of her art. Her voice was perhaps a trifle deficient in power and lacked color, but her runs and trills were most remarkable, her enunciation perfect, and the climax of this very difficult number proved a voice of great range. The singer must have been very much flattered by the attention which the audience gave her, and the warm applause which was rendered. She was called out half a dozen times, to bow her acknowledgments to the assembly she had so charmed.

O. E. Borden's efforts in the direction of high class music are too well known to call for any compliments here. It is only to be regretted and sincerely so, that these efforts are not more liberally appreciated.

ER EVENING NEWS,

THE SYMPHONY.

A Small Audience but a Delightful Concert.

There was the smallest audience at the Academy Tuesday night that ever went there for a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. In contrast, the program was one of the most pleasing ever given here by that organization. The audience was a select one of music loving people, but there must be many more people in the city who enjoy such music than were present, and it is to be regretted that a larger number did not turn out for the concert. Such a lack of support of high class musical entertainment will, if continued, shut this city off from such entertainment. The people who desire to hear the best of music will be compelled to go out of town to do so, and Fall River will lose its reputation as one of the few cities in addition to Boston, in New England, that can and do support music of the class of the symphony concerts.

The selections made for the program were as good as possible and their playing made the concert delightful. Conductor Paur's men were in the fullest sympathy with him, and it was one of those occasions when it seemed as though he might have had every instrument in the orchestra connected with his fingers, head, elbows or other parts of his body. The time was as nearly perfect as possible, and there was a richness and swing to the playing that did not require a musical education for appreciation. That every number was enjoyed was evident in the quick and hearty applause. The warm welcome given Mr. Emil Paur when he appeared indicated much regard for him and the orchestra among the people present.

Mrs. Marian Titus, the soloist, is probably as remarkable a singer in the capabilities of her voice as was ever heard here. Its compass is wonderful, and she carries it to a hight that only three or four other public singers can reach. Her voice is very flexible and so finely trained that every quality is used to the best advantage, and an only moderate power is not a disadvantage. In her first number Mrs. Titus illustrated more fully the capabilities of her voice, though in both numbers there were introduced wonderful runs in the high notes. In each she sang up to three or four notes above high C, the limit with which most soprano singers have to be satisfied. In a part of the recitative in her first number she sang in a distinctly contralto register. The singer had the audience with her from the first, being warmly greeted upon first coming out. She was called out four times after her first number and three or four times after the second. This second number "Charming Bird," from "The Pearl of Brazil," was the more pleasing as far as melody went.

The full program given was as follows:

Symphony No. 6, in B. Minor, "Pathetic," op. 74.............Tschaikowsky.
  I. Adagio.—Allegro non troppo.
  II. Allegro con grazia.
  III. Allegro molto vivace.
  IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
Recitative, "Non Paventar," and Aria "Infelice," from "Il Flauto magico .... Mozart
Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana." .... Chabrier
Couplets Du Mysoli, "Charmant oiseau," from la Perle du Bresil." ....Felicien David
Overture, "Tannhaeuser." ...Wagner

The symphony played is one of the newer ones and it has been very popular. It was played here by the Symphony two seasons ago, and was repeated last night by request. Special interest was attached to this symphony recently through the anouncement that it was a favorite of the late Anton Seidl. The adagio lamentoso was played at his funeral services in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. The rhapsody of Chabrier, as its title indicates, was a lively, stirring number and the audience was quick to appreciate the change from the preceding numbers. The overture from "Tannhaeuser" was of course popular. It probably more thoroughly pleased the audience as a whole than any of the previous numbers, a fact specially notable since it was the last number on the program. Everyone has heard something from this opera, and the one who does not enjoy it when well played is quite certain not to enjoy music at all. It is difficult to imagine the overture better played than it was last night, for the orchestra gave it with great spirit and in perfect accord. The audience stayed a minute or two to express its pleasure by applause.

THE FALL

IN STAGELAND.

Academy of Music.

April 13—Prisoner of Zenda.
April 14—Chimes of Normandy (French).
April 15, 16—Fairy's Well.

Casto Theatre.

April 11-week—Diana and vaudeville.

Rich's Theatre.

April 11, 12, 13—Parisian Gaiety Girls.
April 14, 15, 16—Rice & Barton's Gaiety Co.

The Symphony Concert.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city is attended always by what is popularly known as a small but most appreciative audience. Last night was no exception to the rule, and it is to be deeply regretted that a concert so admirable in every detail as that presented in the evening's programme should not secure the patronage it so richly deserves. The orchestra and parquet chairs, however, were comfortably filled with a delighted assembly of music lovers who testified to their enjoyment of specially fine passages by spontaneous outbursts of appause. The big band indeed, was in magnificent form and every one of the 70 men in the orchestra seemed to reach his highest point of excellence. Conductor Emil Paur was, as ever, the controlling inspiration of his men, and Mrs. Marian Titus, the soprano soloist, gave instant and constant pleasure by her rich, full and flexible voice. Altogether it was a concert as remarkable as it was rare, and, as observed before, it is a thousand pities it could not have filled the house.

Tschaikowsky's grandly solemn "Symphonie Pathetique" was the first number on the programme given at special request. The four great movements commencing with the plaintive adagio of the first, and proceeding through the allegro of the second and third movements to the majestic solemnity of the final adagio, were executed in a masterly manner. The work of the wood wind instruments and that of the bass viols and violincellos was employed to wonderfully impressive advantage throughout making for an effect of dignified harmony and symmetry seldom if ever surpassed.

Chabrier's popular rhapsody, "Espana," a fantasy upon Spanish dance music, was all that its name implies, and was invested with a warmth, life and color worthy of Carmen herself. The ensemble work of the orchestra throughout the tripping measures of the capricious piece was enthralling in its delicious sweep and swing. The audience was delighted with "Espana," and showed plainly its appreciation.

Mrs. Marian Titus won the favor of the audience by her first selection a recitative and the aria "Infelice," from "The Magic Flute" of Mozart. She is possessed of a voice remarkably clear, sweet and true and of surprising compass. It was in the "Charmant Oiseau," of David, however, with the finely phrased obligato of Mr. Jacques, that Mrs. Titus' voice was revealed to happiest advantage. Her notes in this latter song were of a sweetness and clearness almost impossible to distinguish from those of the flute, while the duet runs and trills for flute and voice called forth a hearty encore.

The concluding number upon the programme was the grandly familar overture to "Tannhauser" rendered with magnificent effect by the orchestra. The finely solemn strains of the Pilgrim's Chorus rang out triumphant over the blinding whirl of the Venus music and the finale was never more convincingly performed, even by the Symphony itself, so it seemed, than at last night's concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII. NO. 107.
SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy's Playing Was Wonderful Throughout.

Symphony No. 1, in C Minor, Was the Main Selection—Rather Ascetic in Tone, It Still Shows the Genius of the Master—Orchestral Work Excellent.

The programme for last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hal' was:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor	Brahms
Concerto No. 1 for pianoforte	Tschaikowsky
Overture "Egmont"	Beethoven

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist.

The symphony is the least attractive of the four works in kind that Brahms left behind him, but it is the most ambitious and the most elaborate, if not the most clear. Large in conception, sustained to the topmost height of dignity and a production that could have come from only a great master in his craft, it assuredly is; but increased familiarity with it does not make it less ascetic in effect than it seemed at first, and does not remove wholly an impression that, notwithstanding the infinite pains that the composer lavished upon it, and the immense mass of material that it contains, what it says is not quite in due proportion to the labor taken in saying it. However, that point has been debated so often that nothing is to be gained by returning to it again.

The performance was on the whole the most satisfying that the symphony has ever obtained here. Mr. Paur read it splendidly, not a point was missed, the phrasing was masterly, the emphasis vigorous and the distinctive characteristics of the work were brought out unerringly. Particularly fine was the chaste and large, interpretation of the andante, and there was immense fire in the climax of the last movement. The orchestra acquitted itself in its most perfect manner, which means magnificently. The rendering of the work was received with tremendous acclaim.

Of Joseffy's playing in the Tschaikowsky concerto it is difficult to write in terms that shall adequately describe it. It was wonderful in every way, and in nothing more than in the deep artistic spirit and intelligence and the absolute purity of taste that pervaded it. Finger-work! It would be madness to expect anything better; it is not easy even to imagine it. The interpretation and execution were equally remarkable, equally fascinating, equally worthy an artist unsurpassed in illustrating and emphasizing all that is most admirable and elevating in his art.

The merits of the performance must be left just here, with the added admission that it was, taken all in all, the most brilliant and faultless exhibition of pianoforte playing that the season has brought forth. Never in Music Hall have been heard greater thunders of applause than justly rewarded the artist, nor more excited, spontaneous and absolutely resistless recalls.

The orchestral portion of the concert was rendered in a manner worthy that of the solo part, and in the last movement Mr. Paur produced a crescendo the like of which is not often heard, and the steady and even growth of which, up to the tremendous climax, was fairly thrilling.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto, "Symphonie Nationale Hollandaise," Litolf, and Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, C major, Berlioz. Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska is the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1898.

Mr. Joseffy the Soloist at the 22d Symphony Concert.

The program of the Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Symphony No. 1	Brahms
Concerto No. 1, for piano	Tschaikowsky
Overture "Egmont"	Beethoven

The feature of the concert was the extraordinary performance of Tschaikowsky's exciting concerto. It is true that at the first Mr. Joseffy occasionally showed signs of nervousness, but he played the majestic opening with unusual breadth and strength. It is not easy to speak of either his performance or of the accompaniment of the orchestra under Mr. Paur without indulging in phrases that would seem extravagant to those that were not present. For brilliance, beauty of tone, incredible ease, appreciation of rhythm, dazzling exhibition of all that which is most to be desired in supreme technical proficiency, and also for musical and aesthetic quality, this performance has seldom, if ever, been equaled here during the last ten years. Pianists come and pianists go; they charm; they startle; they amaze. But the star Joseffy shines brightest when the musical sky is ablaze with constellations.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1898.

Rafael Joseffy the Symphony Concert Soloist.

The celebrated pianist, Rafael Joseffy, was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts, his contribution being the concerto in B flat minor, by Tschaikowsky. The orchestral numbers were Brahm's first symphony and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The concerto is notable for the grand movement which introduces the work, the principal theme being scored for the solo instrument and the orchestra in the most skilful manner, and the movement culminating in a climax of tremendous power. Joseffy's interpretation of this portion of the work was admirable throughout, the fortissimo sweeps and runs in octaves being played with great vigor and clarity of tone, the solo instrument generally retaining its proper prominence against the mighty orchestral background. The rude theme in the middle of the movement was given with a sympathetic touch, and the cadenzas were noble illustrations of the pianist's power and finger dexterity.

The contrasting second movement, quaint and delicate, was beautifully interpreted, and after the turmoil of the first part the simple melodies acted as a relief to wrought-up feelings of the auditor. The queer dronings in the orchestra were admirably set forth, and the flute phrases were deliciously tuneful. Here Joseffy again gave some very brilliant cadenza work. In these days of skilful technicians special praise for his ability is uncalled for, Suffice it to say that he has lost none of his wonderful dexterity. The robust finale, with the tremendous wrist action in the closing coda, was presented in an impassioned manner, the Cossack suggestiveness being at all times in evidence. The pianist was recalled again and again at the close of the number.

The orchestra performed its work magnificently. Possibly in some of the opening phrases of the first and in the climax in the closing movements there was a volume of fortissimo work which overshadowed the piano part, but these defects, if they were defects, were of but slight consequence. The Brahms' symphony was given without the so-called "smoothness," which frequently belies the character of the composition in the first part, Mr Paur's reading appearing to be fully in accord with the composers' idea of treatment. The various contingents gave out their independent phrases perfectly and the "Hymn of Joy" was splendidly voiced. The "Egmont" overture was performed with the usual verve and brilliancy.

Mme Melanie Wienzkowska, pianist, will be the soloist this week. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," Litoff, and the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1898.

Rafael Joseffy's Success at the Symphony Concert.

An audience large and critical, yet extremely appreciative, greeted Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the soloist, at the Symphony concert Saturday evening.

The programme included Brahm's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68; Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23, and Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," op 84.

Tschaikowsky's concerto is notable for the series of stupendous chords in the introductory grand movement. These were executed with a wonderfully telling effect and with a technique well nigh faultless. The principal theme is scored for the piano and the orchestra in a most masterly manner where the movement has its culmination in a climax of almost irresistible power.

The pianist's interpretation of this movement was characterized by rare strength and individuality, and a splendid freedom of execution. Not once did he permit his own part to be really lost in the tremendous volume of orchestral harmony that would have obscured the work of a less skillful player.

His sweeps and runs in fortissimo, particularly those in octaves, were given with rare brilliancy and purity.

The first movement lent a background for the second and produced a remarkably fine artistic anthithesis. The second movement, with its simpler and restful themes, came as a grateful relief from the tension of the preceding one.

No opportunity was lost for brilliant cadenza work or the sympathetic and delicate rendering of the fine flute phrases. Mr. Joseffy was encored several times.

In the Brahms symphony the orchestra appeared to exceptionally good advantage and gave an interpretation remarkable for its individuality and originality. The "Egmont" overture was rendered with equal brilliancy and effectiveness.

Mme. Wienkowska, pianist, will be the soloist this week. The programme will be: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; "Symphonie National Hollandaise," Litoff, and the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony.

MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, opus 23.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," opus 84.
Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the pianist.

The Brahms symphony seemed to us to go heavily and without life. The tempi were, for the most part, very slow indeed, and there was hardly an expressive passage in the music that was not dragged out still slower. Only toward the close of the finale did things begin to brighten up. We felt the same thing about the "Egmont" overture, on which the carved initials "R. W." were plainly decipherable. Why, oh why, did Wagner have to meddle with this overture, and induce people to take all the life out of it?

Mr. Joseffy's playing of the Tchaikovsky concerto was a triumph from beginning to end. We have heard him do a deal of fine playing here, first and last, but cannot remember his doing anything so entirely great as his performance of this concerto last Saturday. Vigour and beauty of touch, dazzling technique, rhythmic life, telling accent, all were there to the highest degree; then the most searching expressiveness in cantilena, the most wondrous delicacy in fine point-lace work; above all, a totality of conception, a subordination of details to the whole, that made each movement stand out as one block! The man played as from a tripod! The audience was not slow to appreciate it, and the recalls after the concerto was over were many and of the heartiest.

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe;" Litolff, concerto-symphonie for pianoforte, No. 3, in E-flat major, "National Hollandois," opus 45; Berlioz, symphonie fantastique, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a. Mme. Mélanie Wienzkowska will be the pianist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1898.

The programme for the twenty-second Symphony concert was made up of three works only—Brahms's first symphony and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, with Tschaikowsky's first pianoforte concerto set between them, Mr. Joseffy being the solo player.

With every new hearing of that symphony the notion recurs to us that it made such a tremendous impression upon its earliest hearers, and has since maintained a certain dominance over their successors, in part at least by dint of sheer weight and dogmatic reiteration. It is unquestionably great; it is at times majestic, noble and graciously beautiful. It has in its second and third movements real winsomeness, and in the last there are pages of inspiring dash and vigor. But it has also obscurity and dulness; the first movement, learned, intricate and powerful by some ingenious simplicity, yet seems to be constantly threatening without accomplishing, to insist upon grim phrases which seem really to decide the less the oftener they return. In spite of its greatness, one has little difficulty in receiving it as a first work and understanding how the composer took a good while for his ideas and his methods to settle before he wrote a second. The orchestra played it as if on honor; but they could not put lucidity of thought into some phrases, however well they shaped them.

The concerto, which is heard only too seldom, is altogether delightful; for its grandeur is not gloomy, its depth is not turbid, nor its arguments obscure. It has dignity in its lofty, serious introduction, tenderness in its lighter moods, sparkling variety in its ornamentation, vivacity and ardor in its spirit, fertile melody and the harmony of significant orchestration. Mr. Joseffy played it superbly, with delicate precision of finger work, well-governed strength for the massive chords and ensemble passages, and musicianly discretion and taste throughout.

The overture was well read and rose strenuously and securely to its tragedy and its splendid ending.

Next Saturday's concert will have for the orchestra Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz. Another new pianist will be heard—Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska, who will play Litolff's "Dutch National Symphony."

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
TUESDAY, APRIL 19, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The eighth and last of the season's concerts given by the Boston Symphony will be given tomorrow evening in Infantry hall at 8 o'clock. The program will comprise Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica," overture, "Rienzi," "Siegfried," "Forest Sounds" Lohengrin, prelude Act 3, Tristan and Isolde and the Tannhauser overture.

Herald

THE FALL R

IN STAGELAND.

Academy of Music.

April 13—Prisoner of Zenda.
April 14—Chimes of Normandy (French).
April 15, 16—Fairy's Well.

Casto Theatre.

April 11-week—Diana and vaudeville.

Rich's Theatre.

April 11, 12, 13—Parisian Gaiety Girls.
April 14, 15, 16—Rice & Barton's Gaiety Co.

The Symphony Concert.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city is attended always by what is popularly known as a small but most appreciative audience. Last night was no exception to the rule, and it is to be deeply regretted that a concert so admirable in every detail as that presented in the evening's programme should not secure the patronage it so richly deserves. The orchestra and parquet chairs, however, were comfortably filled with a delighted assembly of music lovers who testified to their enjoyment of specially fine passages by spontaneous outbursts of appause. The big band indeed, was in magnificent form and every one of the 70 men in the orchestra seemed to reach his highest point of excellence. Conductor Emil Paur was, as ever, the controlling inspiration of his men, and Mrs. Marian Titus, the soprano soloist, gave instant and constant pleasure by her rich, full and flexible voice. Altogether it was a concert as remarkable as it was rare, and, as observed before, it is a thousand pities it could not have filled the house.

Tschaikowsky's grandly solemn "Symphonie Pathetique" was the first number on the programme given at special request. The four great movements commencing with the plaintive adagio of the first, and proceeding through the allegro of the second and third movements to the majestic solemnity of the final adagio, were executed in a masterly manner. The work of the wood wind instruments and that of the bass viols and violincellos was employed to wonderfully impressive advantage throughout making for an effect of dignified harmony and symmetry seldom if ever surpassed.

Chabrier's popular rhapsody, "Espana," a fantasy upon Spanish dance music, was all that its name implies, and was invested with a warmth, life and color worthy of Carmen herself. The ensemble work of the orchestra throughout the tripping measures of the capricious piece was enthralling in its delicious sweep and swing. The audience was delighted with "Espana," and showed plainly its appreciation.

Mrs. Marian Titus won the favor of the audience by her first selection a recitative and the aria "Infelice," from "The Magic Flute" of Mozart. She is possessed of a voice remarkably clear, sweet and true and of surprising compass. It was in the "Charmant Oiseau," of David, however, with the finely phrased obligato of Mr. Jacques, that Mrs. Titus' voice was revealed to happiest advantage. Her notes in this latter song were of a sweetness and clearness almost impossible to distinguish from those of the flute, while the duet runs and trills for flute and voice called forth a hearty encore.

The concluding number upon the programme was the grandly familar overture to "Tannhauser" rendered with magnificent effect by the orchestra. The finely solemn strains of the Pilgrim's Chorus rang out triumphant over the blinding whirl of the Venus music and the finale was never more convincingly performed, even by the Symphony itself, so it seemed, than at last night's concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 107.
SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Rafael Joseffy's Playing Was Wonderful Throughout.

Symphony No. 1, in C Minor, Was the Main Selection—Rather Ascetic in Tone, It Still Shows the Genius of the Master—Orchestral Work Excellent.

The programme for last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hal' was:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor..........Brahms
Concerto No. 1 for pianoforte.....Tschaikowsky
Overture "Egmont"................Beethoven

Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the soloist.

The symphony is the least attractive of the four works in kind that Brahms left behind him, but it is the most ambitious and the most elaborate, if not the most clear. Large in conception, sustained to the topmost height of dignity and a production that could have come from only a great master in his craft, it assuredly is; but increased familiarity with it does not make it less ascetic in effect than it seemed at first, and does not remove wholly an impression that, notwithstanding the infinite pains that the composer lavished upon it, and the immense mass of material that it contains, what it says is not quite in due proportion to the labor taken in saying it. However, that point has been debated so often that nothing is to be gained by returning to it again.

The performance was on the whole the most satisfying that the symphony has ever obtained here. Mr. Paur read it splendidly, not a point was missed, the phrasing was masterly, the emphasis vigorous and the distinctive characteristics of the work were brought out unerringly. Particularly fine was the chaste and large, interpretation of the andante, and there was immense fire in the climax of the last movement. The orchestra acquitted itself in its most perfect manner, which means magnificently. The rendering of the work was received with tremendous acclaim.

Of Joseffy's playing in the Tschaikowsky concerto it is difficult to write in terms that shall adequately describe it. It was wonderful in every way, and in nothing more than in the deep artistic spirit and intelligence and the absolute purity of taste that pervaded it. Finger-work! It would be madness to expect anything better; it is not easy even to imagine it. The interpretation and execution were equally remarkable, equally fascinating, equally worthy an artist unsurpassed in illustrating and emphasizing all that is most admirable and elevating in his art.

The merits of the performance must be left just here, with the added admission that it was, taken all in all, the most brilliant and faultless exhibition of pianoforte playing that the season has brought forth. Never in Music Hall have been heard greater thunders of applause than justly rewarded the artist, nor more excited, spontaneous and absolutely resistless recalls.

The orchestral portion of the concert was rendered in a manner worthy that of the solo part, and in the last movement Mr. Paur produced a crescendo the like of which is not often heard, and the steady and even growth of which, up to the tremendous climax, was fairly thrilling.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto, "Symphonie Nationale Hollandaise," Litolf, and Fantastic Symphony No. 1, C major, Berlioz. Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska is the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1898.

Mr. Joseffy the Soloist at the 22d Symphony Concert.

The program of the Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Symphony No. 1........................Brahms
Concerto No. 1, for piano......Tschaikowsky
Overture "Egmont" ....Beethoven

The feature of the concert was the extraordinary performance of Tschaikowsky's exciting concerto. It is true that at the first Mr. Joseffy occasionally showed signs of nervousness, but he played the majestic opening with unusual breadth and strength. It is not easy to speak of either his performance or of the accompaniment of the orchestra under Mr. Paur without indulging in phrases that would seem extravagant to those that were not present. For brilliance, beauty of tone, incredible ease, appreciation of rhythm, dazzling exhibition of all that which is most to be desired in supreme technical proficiency, and also for musical and aesthetic quality, this performance has seldom, if ever, been equaled here during the last ten years. Pianists come and pianists go; they charm; they startle; they amaze. But the star Joseffy shines brightest when the musical sky is ablaze with constellations.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1898.

Rafael Joseffy the Symphony Concert Soloist.

The celebrated pianist, Rafael Joseffy, was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts, his contribution being the concerto in B flat minor, by Tschaikowsky. The orchestral numbers were Brahm's first symphony and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. The concerto is notable for the grand movement which introduces the work, the principal theme being scored for the solo instrument and the orchestra in the most skilful manner, and the movement culminating in a climax of tremendous power. Joseffy's interpretation of this portion of the work was admirable throughout, the fortissimo sweeps and runs in octaves being played with great vigor and clarity of tone, the solo instrument generally retaining its proper prominence against the mighty orchestral background. The rude theme in the middle of the movement was given with a sympathetic touch, and the cadenzas were noble illustrations of the pianist's power and finger dexterity.

The contrasting second movement, quaint and delicate, was beautifully interpreted, and after the turmoil of the first part the simple melodies acted as a relief to wrought-up feelings of the auditor. The queer dronings in the orchestra were admirably set forth, and the flute phrases were deliciously tuneful. Here Joseffy again gave some very brilliant cadenza work. In these days of skilful technicians special praise for his ability is uncalled for. Suffice it to say that he has lost none of his wonderful dexterity. The robust finale, with the tremendous wrist action in the closing coda, was presented in an impassioned manner, the Cossack suggestiveness being at all times in evidence. The pianist was recalled again and again at the close of the number.

The orchestra performed its work magnificently. Possibly in some of the opening phrases of the first and in the climax in the closing movements there was a volume of fortissimo work which overshadowed the piano part, but these defects, if they were defects, were of but slight consequence. The Brahms' symphony was given without the so-called "smoothness," which frequently belies the character of the composition in the first part, Mr Paur's reading appearing to be fully in accord with the composers' idea of treatment. The various contingents gave out their independent phrases perfectly and the "Hymn of Joy" was splendidly voiced. The "Egmont" overture was performed with the usual verve and brilliancy.

Mme Melanie Wienzkowska, pianist, will be the soloist this week. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, "Symphonie National Hollandaise," Litoff, and the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1898.

Rafael Joseffy's Success at the Symphony Concert.

An audience large and critical, yet extremely appreciative, greeted Mr. Rafael Joseffy, the soloist, at the Symphony concert Saturday evening.

The programme included Brahm's Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68; Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23, and Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," op 84.

Tschaikowsky's concerto is notable for the series of stupendous chords in the introductory grand movement. These were executed with a wonderfully telling effect and with a technique well nigh faultless. The principal theme is scored for the piano and the orchestra in a most masterly manner where the movement has its culmination in a climax of almost irresistible power.

The pianist's interpretation of this movement was characterized by rare strength and individuality, and a splendid freedom of execution. Not once did he permit his own part to be really lost in the tremendous volume of orchestral harmony that would have obscured the work of a less skillful player.

His sweeps and runs in fortissimo, particularly those in octaves, were given with rare brilliancy and purity.

The first movement lent a background for the second and produced a remarkably fine artistic anthithesis. The second movement, with its simpler and restful themes, came as a grateful relief from the tension of the preceding one.

No opportunity was lost for brilliant cadenza work or the sympathetic and delicate rendering of the fine flute phrases. Mr. Joseffy was encored several times.

In the Brahms symphony the orchestra appeared to exceptionally good advantage and gave an interpretation remarkable for its individuality and originality. The "Egmont" overture was rendered with equal brilliancy and effectiveness.

Mme. Wienkowska, pianist, will be the soloist this week. The programme will be: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte and orchestra; "Symphonie National Hollandaise," Litoff, and the Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor, opus 23.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," opus 84.
Mr. Rafael Joseffy was the pianist.

The Brahms symphony seemed to us to go heavily and without life. The tempi were, for the most part, very slow indeed, and there was hardly an expressive passage in the music that was not dragged out still slower. Only toward the close of the finale did things begin to brighten up. We felt the same thing about the "Egmont" overture, on which the carved initials "R. W." were plainly decipherable. Why, oh why, did Wagner have to meddle with this overture, and induce people to take all the life out of it?

Mr. Joseffy's playing of the Tchaikovsky concerto was a triumph from beginning to end. We have heard him do a deal of fine playing here, first and last, but cannot remember his doing anything so entirely great as his performance of this concerto last Saturday. Vigour and beauty of touch, dazzling technique, rhythmic life, telling accent, all were there to the highest degree; then the most searching expressiveness in cantilena, the most wondrous delicacy in fine point-lace work; above all, a totality of conception, a subordination of details to the whole, that made each movement stand out as one block! The man played as from a tripod! The audience was not slow to appreciate it, and the recalls after the concerto was over were many and of the heartiest.

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe;" Litolff, concerto-symphonie for pianoforte, No. 3, in E-flat major, "National Hollandois," opus 45; Berlioz, symphonie fantastique, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a. Mme. Mélanie Wienzkowska will be the pianist.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1898.

The programme for the twenty-second Symphony concert was made up of three works only—Brahms's first symphony and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, with Tschaikowsky's first pianoforte concerto set between them, Mr. Joseffy being the solo player.

With every new hearing of that symphony the notion recurs to us that it made such a tremendous impression upon its earliest hearers, and has since maintained a certain dominance over their successors, in part at least by dint of sheer weight and dogmatic reiteration. It is unquestionably great; it is at times majestic, noble and graciously beautiful. It has in its second and third movements real winsomeness, and in the last there are pages of inspiring dash and vigor. But it has also obscurity and dulness; the first movement, learned, intricate and powerful by some ingenious simplicity, yet seems to be constantly threatening without accomplishing, to insist upon grim phrases which seem really to decide the less the oftener they return. In spite of its greatness, one has little difficulty in receiving it as a first work and understanding how the composer took a good while for his ideas and his methods to settle before he wrote a second. The orchestra played it as if on honor; but they could not put lucidity of thought into some phrases, however well they shaped them.

The concerto, which is heard only too seldom, is altogether delightful; for its grandeur is not gloomy, its depth is not turbid, nor its arguments obscure. It has dignity in its lofty, serious introduction, tenderness in its lighter moods, sparkling variety in its ornamentation, vivacity and ardor in its spirit, fertile melody and the harmony of significant orchestration. Mr. Joseffy played it superbly, with delicate precision of finger work, well-governed strength for the massive chords and ensemble passages, and musicianly discretion and taste throughout.

The overture was well read and rose strenuously and securely to its tragedy and its splendid ending.

Next Saturday's concert will have for the orchestra Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz. Another new pianist will be heard—Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska, who will play Litolff's "Dutch National Symphony."

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
TUESDAY, APRIL 19, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The eighth and last of the season's concerts given by the Boston Symphony will be given tomorrow evening in Infantry hall at 8 o'clock. The program will comprise Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica," overture, "Rienzi," "Siegfried," "Forest Sounds" Lohengrin, prelude Act 3, Tristan and Isolde and the Tannhauser overture.

[106]

The Boston Traveler

PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.

Seventy-sixth year—Vol. LIV. No. 15.

MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1898.

The Symphony.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; twenty-second concert. Mr. Rafael Joseffy, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor........ Johannes Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor..Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Egmont"............... Ludwig von Beethoven

The one feature was, of course, Mr. Joseffy, who holds his own against any of the flood of pianists who have recently come to this country. He is no mere technicist, and yet what could be more beautiful than his feathery arpeggios, and what more overwhelming than his tremendous octave rushes? And added to all the accomplishments of the fingers he has that something that many noted players lack—that the over-praised Siloti lacked—a great and wonderful nobility of expression, an almost superhuman breadth of style—in short, the fullest development of soul in music. It is needless to go into detail as to his playing of the splendid and fiery concerto; it was a mingling of all the pianistic virtues, a perfect performance from almost any point of view.

The Brahms symphony—heaviest of all his works—was played in a conventional manner. That there are new things in Brahms was amply proven by the interpretation Mr. Thomas and his orchestra gave of another symphony a few weeks ago. But they do not appear under Mr. Paur. However, the work was finely and solidly given. The "Egmont" overture received a fine and spirited performance, and one that showed what a force Beethoven still remains in works of this sort.

WILDER D. QUINT.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.

DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $8.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for this season, was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The series thus closed is the 16th which the orchestra has given in Providence, and the first to contain as many as eight concerts. There has been no diminution in the attendance on account of the extra number of concerts, but, if anything, an increase. Of the 34 numbers presented on the programmes of this year, by far the greater portion have been representative of the modern school. In but a single instance has a composer older than Beethoven been represented. Works by 21 composers have been heard. The greatest number of selections from any one composer was seven. These were by Richard Wagner. Next comes Beethoven with four, Tschaikowsky with three, Mendelssohn with two, all others with but one. The programmes have been upon the whole well varied and interesting, and the assisting soloists have included such fine artists as Johanna Gadski, Gertrude May Stein, Siloti, Joseffy and Alwin Schroeder. Five selections (including one arrangement) were played here this winter for the first time.

Following the custom adopted for the past few years, a Wagner programme was presented last evening for the season's wind-up. The Wagner numbers were preceded, however, by Beethoven's third symphony, commonly known as the "Eroica." There was no soloist, the programme being entirely orchestral; it was presented in the following order:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55 ....Ludwig van Beethoven.
I. Allegro con brio (E-flat major).
II. Marcia funebre; Adagio assai (C minor).
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace (E-flat major). Trio (E-flat major).
IV. Finale: Allegro molto (E-flat major).
"Rienzi," Overture.
"Siegfried," "Forest Sounds."
"Lohengrin," Prelude Act III.
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Isolde's Love Death.
"Tannhauser," Overture......Richard Wagner.

This was not a programme of novelties, for the numbers are familiar ones to the symphony audiences. They were none the less welcome, however, for having been heard before. Beethoven's grand and truly "heroic" symphony received a superb rendering. The selections from Wagner's works, though not arranged in exactly that order, were illustrative of the growth and development of his ideas, from "Reinzi" to the "Trilogy." The overture to his early opera betrays much of the boldness of construction and wonderful skill as an orchestral colorist, which later served to make him famous. The selections were well contrasted, and ended happily with the brilliant and favorite "Tannhauser" overture.

It only remains to say that they were all played with tremendous fire and energy, and with the exquisite attention to the minutest details which usually marks the work of the symphony orchestra. The audience was large and cordial, the applause being both hearty and bestowed with discrimination. And so ends a most pleasant and profitable season.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1898.

The program of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1..............................Brahms
Concerto for piano, No. 1.................Tschaikowsky
Overture, Egmont..........................Beethoven

The feature of the concert was the dazzling performance of Tschaikowsky's exciting concerto by Mr. Joseffy and the orchestra. Mr. Paur accompanied the pianist gloriously, and it was no easy task, for at first Mr. Joseffy was attacked by his old enemy, nervousness, and although he played the majestic opening with unusual breadth and strength, he was not fully master of himself for several pages. But after he was fully himself—and if he would appear in public frequently he would not be obliged to make excuses—his performance was one of almost incredible brilliance and beauty. In arabesques his fingers ran like unto velvet shod white mice. The experienced concert-goer can count easily on one hand performances that have approached that of Mr. Joseffy for splendor of technical display, appreciation of rhythm, fully rounded musical and æsthetic quality. Joseffy is still his only rival.

I know that it is wrong—I know that the finger of scorn will be pointed at me—but I cannot see why anyone makes such a pother over Brahms' First Symphony. There is an austerity in the first movement that is so constant that it finally may compel admiration. Yes, there is a certain passion—the passion of a melancholy graybeard that regrets a youth misspent in studious research—an envious, impotent passion. And the second movement has, I grant you, sublime movements. But the rest? Go to!

Mr. Apthorp in the program-book said: "The third movement (un poco allegretto e grazioso, in A flat major, 2-4 time) takes the place of the traditional scherzo, albeit it has little of the scherzo character. The first part of the movement comprises the working out of three themes in contrasted rhythms, the first of which, given out by the clarinet and other wood-wind over a pizzicato bass in the 'celli, has been compared by mare's-nest hunters to the 'Prayer' in Hérold's 'Zampa.'"

I wish Mr. Apthorp would stop making this mistake. The reproach of alleged recollection of the "Prayer" in "Zampa" is made against the opening measure of the second movement of Brahms' Third Symphony, not the First Symphony.

PHILIP HALE.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eighth and last concert in the series by the Boston symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, is announced for next Wednesday evening, April 20. A few statistics may be of interest. The concert next Wednesday evening ends the sixteenth season of the orchestra in Providence, will be the 1591st performance by this organization and its 65th in this city. As has been a most welcome and acceptable custom for the past two or three seasons, the program will be devoted largely to selections by Wagner, with Beethoven's famous and beautiful Symphony No. 3, Heroic, as an introductory number. The funeral march, which is the second movement of this symphony, ranks as the grandest example in this field of composition.

The first of the Wagner selections is the Overture to the opera of Rienzi. The tremendous vigor of Conductor Paur's reading of this overture is well known and always carries the audience to intense pitch of enthusiasm.

The next number is the beautiful and descriptive Forest Sounds from the second act of Siegfried, in which are deftly woven the Fire Motive, the Siegfried Motive, the Slumber Motive, and the beautiful Bird Song Motive.

The introduction to the Third Act of Lohengrin is a jubilant and brilliant selection, supposed to represent the hall room music played at the wedding of Lohengrin and Elsa. The Tristan and Isolde was first given under Bulow's direction at the court opera in Munich on June 10, 1865. It is interesting to note that the musical style of Tristan turned out to be so novel and unprecedented that singers and managers were very shy of undertaking the work. It was at once accepted by the court opera in Vienna, but abandoned after upward of fifty rehearsals as impracticable, and it was not until Ludwig II, of Bavaria, ordered its performance in 1865 that it saw the light of publicity.

The closing number needs only the simple announcement of its title, the overture to Tannhauser, to awaken the most pleasurable anticipation of a work which has held its own in the field of music in spite of repeated performances by all the orchestras of the world.

THE NEWS.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1898.

Final Symphony Concert.

The eighth and final concert in the season's course given in this city by the Boston Symphony will take place in Infantry Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The concerts have all been of a high order and have come up to the expectations of the many music lovers that have listened to them and tonight will close one of the most satisfactory and successful seasons in Providence. The program for tonight is fully up to the usual standard and includes; Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, Eroica; Rienzi, overture; Siegfried, Forest Sounds; Lohengrin, prelude act III; Tristan and Isolde and Tannhauser, overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1898.

Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique by the Symphony Orchestra.

Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique does not lose its interest and it has seldom received so good a performance as at the concert of Saturday. It may be regarded as a musical love-letter written to the pretty Irish actress, Harriet Smithson, with the fifth movement a malicious postscript written against her.

An opium dream composed by the son of a confirmed opium eater can scarcely be expected to present perfect balance, and this symphony has its moments of maundering as well as its instants of loftiest genius.

The first movement is an example of the vagueness of Berlioz, and we do not thrill very much at the "love-theme" which forms its back-bone, but it forms a good study of orchestral scoring and is almost the very beginning of the modern school of programme-music ecstasies. It was given with too little caprice, with only slight indications of its sighing, longings and yearnings.

The second movement, the dainty waltz, was danced in brogans; there was a heaviness and inelastic character that suited ill to Gallic ball-room grace, but the intertwining of the love-theme and the dance was made clear and intelligible.

From this point on Mr. Paur and his men achieved a memorable performance of this most intricate and difficult work. The dialogue between English horn and oboe, representing shepherd and shepherdess, was extremely beautiful in its execution, the English horn especially winning great success.

There are many instrumental dialogues in music, in Beethoven, Raff, etc., one may often find the violoncello become a loving youth, while the violin personifies a timid maiden, and in Weber's "Invitation a la Danse" and (according to the composer himself) in Beethoven's two sonatas, Op. 14, the same dialogue principle is applied to the piano, but scarcely any of these dialogues may compare in directness and simplicity with this conversation of English horn and oboe.

We have some times found fault with the energy of the kettle-drummer, but on this occasion the kettledrums were played to perfection. They have a most important part in this eclogue, for here Berlioz has gone beyond Beethoven, who had produced a chord by striking the two drums together, and Meyerbeer, who had played a march on these instruments, by giving actual harmonies to a double set of kettledrums. And they were excellently played in this performance.

In the march to execution, the most graphic bit of programme-music that the present writer is acquainted with, the bassoons deserved a host of gilt-edged adjectives.

Berlioz, in using these brooding tones as a constant under-current to his tragedy, has accidentally brought back a very ancient Greek touch; in the Ionian cities it was the custom to lead culprits to execution to the sound of flutes (and under the term of "Tibia" one can readily accept instruments of the bassoon family) and the old Greek historians say that the Nome of Kradias (as this march to execution was called) was particularly depressing.

Berlioz intimates that these muttering bassoons pictured the menacing tread of the crowd accompanying the tumbril to the guillotine; possibly he had heard of Dickens's description of such tramping, in the "Tale of Two Cities,"—"Headlong, mad and dangerous footsteps to force their way into anybody's life, footsteps not easily made clean again if once stained red, the footsteps raging in Saint Antoine afar off."

It was altogether a great reading and a great performance of the dreadful march, and we fancy that none of the recent Maeterlincks of music, who deal professionally in horrors, can ever equal the actual grimness of this picture. The raucous tone of the ophicleides, which Berlioz especially desired here, was well imitated by the tubas.

In the final scene in Hades Berlioz has added to the tone-color of the Imp of the orchestra (the piccolo), a still fiercer instrument not belonging to the orchestral forces—the E flat clarinette—which screamed away ferociously in this infernal tone-picture and lampooned the tender love-theme with fiery ardor. Then came that wild parody of the "Dies Irae" with a sardonic counterpoint that was given with appropriately fiendish vigor.

From the class of music in this picture of the infernal region we gather the pleasing inference that there are no musical critics in Hades. The performance of this movement was something superb; the thermometer never dropped below 1500 in the shade and every measure of the ending went "fuocoso."

To go from this to Litolff's piano concerto in E flat (the "Dutch National" concerto) was to go from the crater of Vesuvius to the banks of Amsterdam canal; the work would have sounded old-fashioned anyway, but now it also sounded tame.

Madame Wienzkowska was the pianist; she played with vehemence rather than with power, and there were a few slips to condone. The shading went to extremes and some passages were inaudible from the ce[illegible] of the hall; but the finale was sho[illegible] and some nervousness that was at first evident wore off towards the close. The bravura displayed by the pianist evidently won the audience and she was heartily recalled twice, at the close.

With the "Euryanthe" overture the concert ended. This was played with spirit and the delicate passages in pianissimo were exquisitely given. A resemblance to portions of the fourth movement of the preceding symphony could be noticed.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 114.

SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Concert but One of the Orchestra's Season.

Brilliant Performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony—Mme. Wienzkowska Plays Litolff's "Dutch National" Concerto—Her Work Not Effective.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Fantastic symphony, No. 1, in C.......Berlioz
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 3, in E flat.Litolff
Overture "Euryanthe"...................Weber

The soloist was Mme. Melaine Wienzkowska.

The orchestration of the Berlioz symphony still holds its own firmly, notwithstanding the stride that has been made in instrumentation by the more modern composers, to whom he pointed out the new path in the art. And it may be justly said that in point of clearness and balance of tone color he remains, on the whole, superior to those who have followed him. There is never any confusion in his scores; every part stands out distinctly, even in the noisiest and most massive moments.

This work, with its companion sequel, was written by him while yet a pupil at the Conservatoire, and it is easy to understand why it should have excited the disgust of the classical Cherubini, independently of his personal hatred of the young composer. It was this symphony that moved Paganini, after he had heard it performed, to kneel before Berlioz, kiss his hands, and the next morning to send him a check for £20,000.

The opening movement and the finale have aged somewhat, but the "Scene in the Fields" and the "March to the Scaffold" still retain their original freshness and interest, possibly because one is not disturbed, in listening to them, by attempting to discover at every step their meaning as programme music. They tell their own story lucidly and are attractive as music pure and simple. The performance of the work was brilliant in every way, splendid in its tone color and steadily impressive in the fine dramatic force that marked it.

The Litolff concerto is irremediably old fashioned, its banalities are countless, and its pretentiousness in view of the f[illegible]sy results, almost silly. The scherzo is its one redeeming point, slight as it is. Here is the only opportunity afforded the soloist to come into prominece, but even in this movement there is little else than weak conventionality.

Mme. W[illegible]kowska was unfortunate in coming after the many artists of the first rank who have been heard here recently. Her playing was neat and in the scherzo spirited, fluent and pleasing, but it suffered by inevitable comparisons, and also by the composition which she had chosen for a display of her powers. She was generously applauded and received a recall.

The next concert will be the last of this season's series. The programme for it is: Beethoven's "Eroica," symphony, and Wagner's "Rienzi," overture; the prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," and "Isolde's Love Death"; the prelude to act 3, "Lohengrin," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24.
(Copyright 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska was the soloist. This was the programme: Fantasie symphony by Berlioz, concerto for piano and orchestra, "Symphonie Nationale Hollandaise" No. 3, by Henry Litolff; overture to "Euryanthe," Weber.

The next rehearsal and concert will be the last of the present season. Beethoven's third symphony and several Wagner selections are promised.

The Boston Traveler
PUBLISHED BY THE
BOSTON TRAVELER CO.,
TORREY E. WARDNER, President.
Seventy-sixth year—Vol. LIV. No. 15.
MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1898.

The Symphony.

Seventeenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; twenty-second concert. Mr. Rafael Joseffy, soloist. The programme:

Symphony No. 1, in C minor........ Johannes Brahms
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in B-flat minor..Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky
Overture to "Egmont".............. Ludwig von Beethoven

The one feature was, of course, Mr. Joseffy, who holds his own against any of the flood of pianists who have recently come to this country. He is no mere technicist, and yet what could be more beautiful than his feathery arpeggios, and what more overwhelming than his tremendous octave rushes? And added to all the accomplishments of the fingers he has that something that many noted players lack—that the over-praised Siloti lacked—a great and wonderful nobility of expression, an almost superhuman breadth of style—in short, the fullest development of soul in music. It is needless to go into detail as to his playing of the splendid and fiery concerto; it was a mingling of all the pianistic virtues, a perfect performance from almost any point of view.

The Brahms symphony—heaviest of all his works—was played in a conventional manner. That there are new things in Brahms was amply proven by the interpretation Mr. Thomas and his orchestra gave of another symphony a few weeks ago. But they do not appear under Mr. Paur. However, the work was finely and solidly given. The "Egmont" overture received a fine and spirited performance, and one that showed what a force Beethoven still remains in works of this sort.

WILDER D. QUINT.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.
THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for this season, was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The series thus closed is the 16th which the orchestra has given in Providence, and the first to contain as many as eight concerts. There has been no diminution in the attendance on account of the extra number of concerts, but, if anything, an increase. Of the 34 numbers presented on the programmes of this year, by far the greater portion have been representative of the modern school. In but a single instance has a composer older than Beethoven been represented. Works by 21 composers have been heard. The greatest number of selections from any one composer was seven. These were by Richard Wagner. Next comes Beethoven with four, Tschaikowsky with three, Mendelssohn with two, all others with but one. The programmes have been upon the whole well varied and interesting, and the assisting soloists have included such fine artists as Johanna Gadski, Gertrude May Stein, Siloti, Joseffy and Alwin Schroeder. Five selections (including one arrangement) were played here this winter for the first time.

Following the custom adopted for the past few years, a Wagner programme was presented last evening for the season's wind-up. The Wagner numbers were preceded, however, by Beethoven's third symphony, commonly known as the "Eroica." There was no soloist, the programme being entirely orchestral; it was presented in the following order:

Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55 ....Ludwig van Beethoven.
I. Allegro con brio (E-flat major).
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai (C minor).
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace (E-flat major). Trio (E-flat major).
IV. Finale: Allegro molto (E-flat major).
"Rienzi," Overture.
"Siegfried," "Forest Sounds."
"Lohengrin," Prelude Act III.
"Tristan and Isolde," Prelude and Isolde's Love Death.
"Tannhauser," Overture......Richard Wagner.

This was not a programme of novelties, for the numbers are familiar ones to the symphony audiences. They were none the less welcome, however, for having been heard before. Beethoven's grand and truly "heroic" symphony received a superb rendering. The selections from Wagner's works, though not arranged in exactly that order, were illustrative of the growth and development of his ideas, from "Reinzi" to the "Trilogy." The overture to his early opera betrays much of the boldness of construction and wonderful skill as an orchestral colorist, which later served to make him famous. The selections were well contrasted, and ended happily with the brilliant and favorite "Tannhauser" overture.

It only remains to say that they were all played with tremendous fire and energy, and with the exquisite attention to the minutest details which usually marks the work of the symphony orchestra. The audience was large and cordial, the applause being both hearty and bestowed with discrimination. And so ends a most pleasant and profitable season.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1898.

The program of the twenty-second Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1................................Brahms
Concerto for piano, No. 1..................Tschaikowsky
Overture, Egmont............................Beethoven

The feature of the concert was the dazzling performance of Tschaikowsky's exciting concerto by Mr. Joseffy and the orchestra. Mr. Paur accompanied the pianist gloriously, and it was no easy task, for at first Mr. Joseffy was attacked by his old enemy, nervousness, and although he played the majestic opening with unusual breadth and strength, he was not fully master of himself for several pages. But after he was fully himself—and if he would appear in public frequently he would not be obliged to make excuses—his performance was one of almost incredible brilliance and beauty. In arabesques his fingers ran like unto velvet shod white mice. The experienced concert-goer can count easily on one hand performances that have approached that of Mr. Joseffy for splendor of technical display, appreciation of rhythm, fully rounded musical and æsthetic quality. Joseffy is still his only rival.

I know that it is wrong—I know that the finger of scorn will be pointed at me—but I cannot see why anyone makes such a pother over Brahms' First Symphony. There is an austerity in the first movement that is so constant that it finally may compel admiration. Yes, there is a certain passion—the passion of a melancholy graybeard that regrets a youth misspent in studious research—an envious, impotent passion. And the second movement has, I grant you, sublime movements. But the rest? Go to!

Mr. Apthorp in the program-book said: "The third movement (un poco allegretto e grazioso, in A flat major, 2-4 time) takes the place of the traditional scherzo, albeit it has little of the scherzo character. The first part of the movement comprises the working out of three themes in contrasted rhythms, the first of which, given out by the clarinet and other wood-wind over a pizzicato bass in the 'celli, has been compared by mare's-nest hunters to the 'Prayer' in Hérold's 'Zampa.'"

I wish Mr. Apthorp would stop making this mistake. The reproach of alleged recollection of the "Prayer" in "Zampa" is made against the opening measure of the second movement of Brahms' Third Symphony, not the First Symphony.

PHILIP HALE.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1898.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eighth and last concert in the series by the Boston symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall, is announced for next Wednesday evening, April 20. A few statistics may be of interest. The concert next Wednesday evening ends the sixteenth season of the orchestra in Providence, will be the 1591st performance by this organization and its 65th in this city. As has been a most welcome and acceptable custom for the past two or three seasons, the program will be devoted largely to selections by Wagner, with Beethoven's famous and beautiful Symphony No. 3, Heroic, as an introductory number. The funeral march, which is the second movement of this symphony, ranks as the grandest example in this field of composition.

The first of the Wagner selections is the Overture to the opera of Rienzi. The tremendous vigor of Conductor Paur's reading of this overture is well known and always carries the audience to intense pitch of enthusiasm.

The next number is the beautiful and descriptive Forest Sounds from the second act of Siegfried, in which are deftly woven the Fire Motive, the Siegfried Motive, the Slumber Motive, and the beautiful Bird Song Motive.

The introduction to the Third Act of Lohengrin is a jubilant and brilliant selection, supposed to represent the hall room music played at the wedding of Lohengrin and Elsa. The Tristan and Isolde was first given under Bulow's direction at the court opera in Munich on June 10. 1865. It is interesting to note that the musical style of Tristan turned out to be so novel and unprecedented that singers and managers were very shy of undertaking the work. It was at once accepted by the court opera in Vienna, but abandoned after upward of fifty rehearsals as impracticable, and it was not until Ludwig II, of Bavaria, ordered its performance in 1865 that it saw the light of publicity.

The closing number needs only the simple announcement of its title, the overture to Tannhauser, to awaken the most pleasurable anticipation of a work which has held its own in the field of music in spite of repeated performances by all the orchestras of the world.

THE NEWS.
DAILY AND WEEKLY.
Providence, Rhode Island.
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1898.

Final Symphony Concert.

The eighth and final concert in the season's course given in this city by the Boston Symphony will take place in Infantry Hall tonight at 8 o'clock. The concerts have all been of a high order and have come up to the expectations of the many music lovers that have listened to them and tonight will close one of the most satisfactory and successful seasons in Providence. The program for tonight is fully up to the usual standard and includes; Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, Eroica; Rienzi, overture; Siegfried, Forest Sounds: Lohengrin, prelude act III; Tristan and Isolde and Tannhauser, overture.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1898.

Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique by the Symphony Orchestra.

Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique does not lose its interest and it has seldom received so good a performance as at the concert of Saturday. It may be regarded as a musical love-letter written to the pretty Irish actress, Harriet Smithson, with the fifth movement a malicious postscript written against her.

An opium dream composed by the son of a confirmed opium eater can scarcely be expected to present perfect balance, and this symphony has its moments of maundering as well as its instants of loftiest genius.

The first movement is an example of the vagueness of Berlioz, and we do not thrill very much at the "love-theme" which forms its back-bone, but it forms a good study of orchestral scoring and is almost the very beginning of the modern school of programme-music ecstasies. It was given with too little caprice, with only slight indications of its sighing, longings and yearnings.

The second movement, the dainty waltz, was danced in brogans; there was a heaviness and inelastic character that suited ill to Gallic ball-room grace, but the intertwining of the love-theme and the dance was made clear and intelligible.

From this point on Mr. Paur and his men achieved a memorable performance of this most intricate and difficult work. The dialogue between English horn and oboe, representing shepherd and shepherdess, was extremely beautiful in its execution, the English horn especially winning great success.

There are many instrumental dialogues in music, in Beethoven, Raff, etc., one may often find the violoncello become a loving youth, while the violin personifies a timid maiden, and in Weber's "Invitation a la Danse" and (according to the composer himself) in Beethoven's two sonatas, Op. 14, the same dialogue principle is applied to the piano, but scarcely any of these dialogues may compare in directness and simplicity with this conversation of English horn and oboe.

We have some times found fault with the energy of the kettle-drummer, but on this occasion the kettledrums were played to perfection. They have a most important part in this eclogue, for here Berlioz has gone beyond Beethoven, who had produced a chord by striking the two drums together, and Meyerbeer, who had played a march on these instruments, by giving actual harmonies to a double set of kettledrums. And they were excellently played in this performance.

In the march to execution, the most graphic bit of programme-music that the present writer is acquainted with, the bassoons deserved a host of gilt-edged adjectives.

Berlioz, in using these brooding tones as a constant under-current to his tragedy, has accidentally brought back a very ancient Greek touch; in the Ionian cities it was the custom to lead culprits to execution to the sound of flutes (and under the term of "Tibia" one can readily accept instruments of the bassoon family) and the old Greek historians say that the Nome of Kradias (as this march to execution was called) was particularly depressing.

Berlioz intimates that these muttering bassoons pictured the menacing tread of the crowd accompanying the tumbril to the guillotine; possibly he had heard of Dickens's description of such tramping, in the "Tale of Two Cities,"—"Headlong, mad and dangerous footsteps to force their way into anybody's life, footsteps not easily made clean again if once stained red, the footsteps raging in Saint Antoine afar off."

It was altogether a great reading and a great performance of the dreadful march, and we fancy that none of the recent Maeterlincks of music, who deal professionally in horrors, can ever equal the actual grimness of this picture. The raucous tone of the ophicleides, which Berlioz especially desired here, was well imitated by the tubas.

In the final scene in Hades Berlioz has added to the tone-color of the Imp of the orchestra (the piccolo), a still fiercer instrument not belonging to the orchestral forces—the E flat clarinette—which screamed away ferociously in this infernal tone-picture and lampooned the tender love-theme with fiery ardor. Then came that wild parody of the "Dies Irae" with a sardonic counterpoint that was given with appropriately fiendish vigor.

From the class of music in this picture of the infernal region we gather the pleasing inference that there are no musical critics in Hades. The performance of this movement was something superb; the thermometer never dropped below 1500 in the shade and every measure of the ending went "fuocoso."

To go from this to Litolff's piano concerto in E flat (the "Dutch National" concerto) was to go from the crater of Vesuvius to the banks of Amsterdam canal; the work would have sounded old-fashioned anyway, but now it also sounded tame.

Madame Wienzkowska was the pianist; she played with vehemence rather than with power, and there were a few slips to condone. The shading went to extremes and some passages were inaudible from the centre of the hall; but the finale was showy and some nervousness that was at first evident wore off towards the close. The bravura displayed by the pianist evidently won the audience and she was heartily recalled twice, at the close.

With the "Euryanthe" overture the concert ended. This was played with spirit and the delicate passages in pianissimo were exquisitely given. A resemblance to portions of the fourth movement of the preceding symphony could be noticed.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 114.
SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1898.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last Concert but One of the Orchestra's Season.

Brilliant Performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony—Mme. Wienzkowska Plays Litolff's "Dutch National" Concerto—Her Work Not Effective.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Fantastic symphony, No. 1, in C.......Berlioz
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 3, in E flat.Litolff
Overture "Euryanthe"....................Weber

The soloist was Mme. Melaine Wienzkowska.

The orchestration of the Berlioz symphony still holds its own firmly, notwithstanding the stride that has been made in instrumentation by the more modern composers, to whom he pointed out the new path in the art. And it may be justly said that in point of clearness and balance of tone color he remains, on the whole, superior to those who have followed him. There is never any confusion in his scores; every part stands out distinctly, even in the noisiest and most massive moments.

This work, with its companion sequel, was written by him while yet a pupil at the Conservatoire, and it is easy to understand why it should have excited the disgust of the classical Cherubini, independently of his personal hatred of the young composer. It was this symphony that moved Paganini, after he had heard it performed, to kneel before Berlioz, kiss his hands, and the next morning to send him a check for f.20,000.

The opening movement and the finale have aged somewhat, but the "Scene in the Fields" and the "March to the Scaffold" still retain their original freshness and interest, possibly because one is not disturbed, in listening to them, by attempting to discover at every step their meaning as programme music. They tell their own story lucidly and are attractive as music pure and simple. The performance of the work was brilliant in every way, splendid in its tone color and steadily impressive in the fine dramatic force that marked it.

The Litolff concerto is irremediably old fashioned, its banalities are countless, and its pretentiousness in view of the [illegible] results, almost silly. The scherzo is its one redeeming point, slight as it is. Here is the only opportunity afforded the soloist to come into prominence, but even in this movement there is little else than weak conventionality.

Mme. Wienzkowska was unfortunate in coming after the many artists of the first rank who have been heard here recently. Her playing was neat and in the scherzo spirited, fluent and pleasing, but it suffered by inevitable comparisons, and also by the composition which she had chosen for a display of her powers. She was generously applauded and received a recall.

The next concert will be the last of this season's series. The programme for it is: Beethoven's "Eroica," symphony, and Wagner's "Rienzi," overture; the prelude to "Tristan and "Isolde," and "Isolde's Love Death"; the prelude to act 3, "Lohengrin," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24.
(Copyright 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska was the soloist. This was the programme: Fantasie symphony by Berlioz, concerto for piano and orchestra, "Symphonie Nationale Hollandais" No. 3, by Henry Litolff; overture to "Euryanthe," Weber.

The next rehearsal and concert will be the last of the present season. Beethoven's third symphony and several Wagner selections are promised.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING

BOSTON, APRIL 24, 1898.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. The program was:

Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, C major, . . Berlioz
Concerto-Symphony for Pianoforte, No. 3, E flat .... Litolff
Overture, "Euryanthe" .... Weber
Soloist, Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska.

Mr. Paur and his orchestra interpreted the Berlioz symphony with rare brilliancy and finish, and not a telling point or a shade of meaning was lost. To the present writer, at least, there is always complete satisfaction in listening to the works of the great French master, for of all the post-Beethoven composers he is the clearest in ideas and the wisest in expression. It is known that Frenchmen are distinguished for this clearness of idea, but with Berlioz the clarity is almost always joined with a plus sign; the ideas were worth the expression. If the Fantastic Symphony is listened to from the program point of view, irritation is apt to set in very early in the hour-long exposition of the effects of opium; but if it be listened to simply as music there is nothing but delight, and a little earache! It is probable that Berlioz was as learned as those who have followed him, but what a wisely artistic use he makes of his learning, and even when he is noisiest how logical and appealing he is, compared with Richard Strauss and his followers! If we must be stunned physically with the mass of sound, how much pleasanter is it to face an artist in his frenzy than a herd of bellowing bulls!

The Litolff concert symphony is not to be blamed because it is old-fashioned, but because it sounds old-fashioned. One is forced into the humiliating position of listening to it with sighing regret and some pitying toleration, and this is not the way to enjoy music. The work suggests that it was written on principle, and not from inspiration, and it suggests that Litolff could have kept on writing in the same way until his paper was exhausted, or he had lost the use of his hands through overwork. The third movement is pretty, and there is brilliant work throughout, but it is the external brilliancy born of fiction, and not the internal brilliancy born of soulful vanity. It may be that the mild radiance of Litolff's moon suffered by coming after the sun of Berlioz's genius, but whatever the reason, the work pleased, but did not impress. Madame Wienzkowska played it with grace, delicacy and spirit, and she is one in the long list of artists who have helped to distinguish the dying years of our century as the era of pianoforte players. She does not stand in the front rank, either on the side of technique or of art, but she plays in a good, workmanlike manner. She has taste and well-trained fingers. In piano playing the good no longer attracts attention, the surprising has so long been served out to us, and so liberally that we have become arrogantly indifferent to everything but the best. Mme. Wienzkowska received hearty applause from the audience that listened to her with great pleasure.

The next concert is the last of the season. The program is Symphony No. 3, E-flat major, op. 55, Beethoven; Overture, "Rienzi," Prelude, and Isolde's "Love Death," Prelude Act III, "Lohengrin; Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1898.

There can never be any doubt that the music which Berlioz wrote for a given scene expressed the spirit and the passion of it, though some moods unquestionably found stronger and more vivid expression through his pan than others. At the penultimate concert of the season Mr. Paur brought forward the "Fantastic" symphony, which is in a certain way a pendant to the "Harold," inasmuch as though each moves an individuality. But in the "Harold" there is a pensive, quiet, almost melancholy wanderer, who passes through successive scenes quite unaffected by them; while in this other work the dreamer beholds the creature of his devotion swept away from him to become an integer in groupings which he cannot enter, the cause of his own horror, and at last a figure in the wild rites of a Walpurgis night. The symphony comes close to the line which separates the emotional from the sensational; but the eloquence, the mastery of art and the splendid command of means save it. This performance was superb in all respects,—dramatic as well as musical—and the virtuosity of the orchestra was luminously demonstrated in the many strange and difficult tasks distributed through the score. This work began the programme, and a fine reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, the delicate pianissimo parts of which received notable care, ended it.

Between these was placed the "Dutch National' concerto-symphony of Litolff, which is no very lofty or beautiful accomplishment. Its first movement goes heavily, its second is a sweet but not deep romance, and its last is lively enough but superficial. There is good skill in the workmanship and the various parts fit nicely together, however. The solo pianoforte was played by Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska, a beautiful and graceful woman and a pleasant player, but apparently not one of the first rank, in spite of her command of pure tone, quick fingers and some concentrated strength.

The last programme will be: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and from Wagner four well worn selections, which might well have been let to rest until next year—the "Rienzi" overture, the usual prelude and love-death of "Tristan and Isolde," the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony, Litolff's "Dutch National" concerto for pianoforte, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" made up the program for the 23d symphony concert last week. Mme Wienzkowska was the soloist. The Berlioz symphony is well named "Fantastic," for the motif of the story it illustrates is set to music in which portions of the instrumentation appear at first to be errors in scoring made by the composer. A close analysis of these seeming irregularities, though, show that Berlioz intended to write as he did, a note in his manuscript to that effect substantiating the correctness of this notation. An "episode in the life of an artist," who sees visions while under the influence of a narcotic, calls for a fantastical treatment musically, and there is no doubt that Berlioz gave free rein to his imaginative and creative powers in building up his dramatic tone poem.

The stupendous difficulties in the first part of the opening movement and the entire fourth and fifth movements are well known, and as these obstacles were admirably surmounted by the orchestra a general commendation is due the whole performance of the work. The "conversation" work of the flute, clarinets and horns was particularly pleasing, their tones being pure and each harmonizing perfectly with its companions. The percussion and fortissimo effects were as noisy and sonorous as one cares to hear in a hall.

Mme Melanie Wienzkowska, the piano soloist, displayed an admirable technique in the Litolff concerto, but she was lacking in the necessary power to show her abilities against the great orchestral background. Her pianissimo phrases were almost inaudible to the majority of the auditors. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture was given with brilliancy by the orchestra, the performance calling for no special encomiums.

For the close of the symphony concerts this week the program will comprise Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Wagner's "Rienzi" and "Tannhauser" overtures and excerpts from "Tristan" and "Lohengrin."

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1898.

* *

The program of the 23d Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Fantastic Symphony No. 1.............Berlioz
Piano concerto No. 3.......................Litolff
Overture, "Euryanthe"...................Weber

The fantastic symphony of Berlioz was finely read and it was played with great spirit and effect. It is a marvelous work when you remember that it was written over 60 years ago, and it would be marvelous if it were written today. I do not say that the flight of imagination never falters; there are moments when Berlioz wanders in thought; then there is that wondrous nightmare, the March to the Scaffold, one of the most gigantic pages of orchestral literature.

Poor Litolff's concerto is old, very old. It was written in 1846, and it was first played here by Jaell in 1853. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played it during the reign of Nikisch in 1889, probably for the sake of the scherzo. This same scherzo is the only movement that has today a semblance of life. The finale was omitted last night, and the order of the scherzo and andante was inverted. What an andante! It should be played by an orchestra in old-fashioned court dress and with a pianist adorned by a cameo brooch. Mrs. Wienzkowska was heard here last season at a Kneisel concert. She has good fingers and a lady-like touch.

* * *

The program of the last concert of this season will be as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica symphony" and these pieces by Wagner: Overture "Rienzi," prelude to Tristan and Isolde's love death, prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhäuser."

Philip Hale.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth and last Symphony concert of this, the seventeenth season, was given last evening in Music Hall. There was no soloist. The first part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's symphony in E flat, No. 3, the "Heroic."

Mr. Paur had an ovation at the close of the concert, which completes his fifth year with this orchestra.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1898.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony concert was as follows:

Fantastic Symphony...............................Berlioz
Piano Concerto, No. 3...............................Litolff
Overture, Euryanthe....................................Weber

Mrs. Mélanie Wienzkowska made her first appearance in Boston at a Kneisel concert, March 8, 1897, when she played with Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder Schumann's Trio in F major. She appeared last night for the first time at a Symphony concert. I wish for her own sake that she had chosen some other concerto, for outside of the scherzo there is little in the work that has now even the semblance of life. Yet there is a curious story attached to the concerto. It was written in Amsterdam in 1846. At the beginning of that year Litolff went to England to arrange family matters—to procure a separation from his wife, who had not lived with him for several years. The parents of the young woman lured him to London, where an action of law was brought against him, and he was condemned to pay a large sum. Litolff did not have the money, and he was imprisoned for debt. After a few months he escaped to Holland, where he was most successful as pianist and composer. And as a tribute of gratitude he chose the Dutch national anthem for the subject of the finale of this concerto. The finale was omitted last night.

The concerto was first played here by Jaell in 1846. I remember Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler playing it in 1889, the first season conducted by Mr. Nikisch. Lord, what a swollen, puffed-up thing, with tawdry ornamentation, the first movement is! It has the substance of a paper bag. The andante is too sweet for anything, and when the horn begins to sob the solo beer drinkers no longer rattle glasses. The scherzo gives more opportunity to the pianist.

Mrs. Wienzkowska has well disciplined fingers, a clear, agreeable touch. She plays with musical intelligence and with an air of good breeding that may well be called elegance.

The symphony was played effectively. To me the feature of the performance was that wondrous nightmare, the "March to the Scaffold," such a march as might have been marched by strange spirits in the City of Dreadful Night.

* * *

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1898

The Promenade Concerts

The regret which prevails at the close of each Symphony season is very materially tempered by the announcement of the Music Hall promenade concerts which follow at an interval of a week. Those who have attended the Symphony concerts find upon the programmes enough of their favorite selections to continue their allegiance, while the general public, rather more partial to popular and lighter numbers, add their presence to the goodly throng. So everybody in the musical and social world is satisfied, and another season brings its testimony to the unfailing popularity of these concerts.

If one looks closely for the secret of this success, perhaps a greater part could be found in the quality of performance of the orchestra, made up of fifty of the same musicians who have sustained the reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The power of good music could not be better shown than in the prevailing quiet among an audience rather predisposed to independence of action, when any favorite selection is being given.

Everything this season will be conducted in very much the old way. There will be the usual reserved tables, and seats in the first balcony at the side. There will also be a generous number of unreserved tables and the entire second balcony given up to the holders of admission tickets. While there will be no attempt at startling changes in the way of interior decorations, an effort in the direction of novelty and attractiveness will be made. All the special features of the previous season will as far as possible be repeated.

As has been the custom for several seasons past, the conductor will again be selected from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the announcement will be received with pleasure that Mr. Max Zach, who for the past three seasons has won many friends, will again conduct. Mr. Zach has shown a very commendable intention to gratify all tastes, as evidenced by the earlier programmes already in preparation.

As for the past three seasons, the business management will be under the direction of Assistant Manager F. R. Comee. The sale of tickets begins at Music Hall on Monday, May 9, at nine o'clock.

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a.
Litolff: Concerto-Symphonie for Pianoforte, No. 3, in E-Flat major, "National Hollandois," opus 45.
Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Mme. Mélanie Wienzkowska was the pianist.

The performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic" was in many ways very fine indeed. The first three movements were beautifully given; especially in the Ball-scene did our orchestra outdo itself in delicacy and rhythmic vivacity. That dangerous place where the waltz-theme, played by the wood-wind, holds back a little as it alights upon the subdominant went to perfection. The March to the Scaffold, on the other hand, did not seem to us to produce its full effect. Whether it was that the cymbals twice failing to make their entrance on a characteristic effect interrupted the continuity of impression, or that the movement was played with less vigor of accent than we have heard it before we certainly did not get the lift from the music that we usually do. The bells in the finale were sadly out of tune—indeed, no pains seemed to have been taken to have them in tune at all—and it was a mistake to have them placed behind the stage; you could hardly hear them. But, with this exception, the movement went with enormous vim and effectiveness. The composition itself wears wonderfully well. The world has long since outgrown the boyish triviality of its programme, as it has outgrown a good many of the would-be-poetic rabidities of the 1830 movement in France; but it has not outgrown the genius with which the young Berlioz turned this programme into music, and bids fair not to outgrow it for some time more to come. When we consider how little Berlioz knew of the great symphonic literature of the world at the time he wrote this "Fantastic" symphony—Beethoven's ninth was not published then—his musical conception seems little short of superhuman in its vastness. Surely so largely planned a slow movement had never been heard in France before. And, with all the questionable points in the work, splendid genius shows itself on every page.

It seems to us a mistake to have the "Fantastic" on a programme when there is any solo work to be done. The symphony is too long and taxing to the listener to come properly anywhere but at the beginning of a concert, and to force a solo-player to appear immediately after that "Witches' Sabbath" is sheer cruelty. Moreover, Litolff's Dutch concerto is perhaps the last work one wants to hear in such a connection today. The concerto is, upon the whole, a stronger work than might have been expected from Litolff, who was an able musician enough, but no heavyweight. There is a rather unusually strong thread of harmony running through the first movement; the Dutch tunes he introduces in the scherzo and the finale are capital in themselves, and he uses them with great skill; the whole scherzo is distinctly clever, it rises well above the second-rate level. Where the work has aged irreparably is in its second themes, in its sentimental cantilenas; the slow movement, in spite of some clever and very beautiful effects of modulation, has the Henri Herz taint; that sort of tune is dead now. Mme. Wienzkowska, for some reason or other, did not play the finale, and took the slow movement before the scherzo. In the three movements she did play she made a distinctly good impression. She has not the most sympathetic touch in the world, but has all-sufficient strength and technique. Her phrasing is especially fine and expressive; Litolff's cantilenas do not afford much opportunity for the expression of deep feeling, but they can be played poignantly, and in this Mme. Wienzkowska rose to the full height of her opportunity. Her rubato is particularly good, a real rubato, not merely a dragging of the rhythm without compensation afterward. She well deserved the warm recall given her at the end. The accompaniment was rather slovenly, the orchestra playing as they sometimes do when they want to show themselves superior to a work. The wrong tuning of the kettle-drums, by the way, gave a strangely Fafnerian tinge to the opening measures of the first movement; the tonic could pass muster, at a pinch, but the dominant was uncanny.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture was played with a will, but with no exaggerated distinction. The too slow second theme was not pleasant.

The next programme is: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55; Wagner, overture to "Rienzi;" prelude and Isoldens Liebestod, from "Tristan und Isolde;" Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin;" overture to "Tannhäuser."

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.
BOSTON, APRIL 24, 1898.

The Symphony Concert.

The twenty-third concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. The program was:

Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, C major, . . Berlioz
Concerto-Symphony for Pianoforte, No. 3, E flat . . . . Litolff
Overture, "Euryanthe" . . . . Weber
Soloist, Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska.

Mr. Paur and his orchestra interpreted the Berlioz symphony with rare brilliancy and finish, and not a telling point or a shade of meaning was lost. To the present writer, at least, there is always complete satisfaction in listening to the works of the great French master, for of all the post-Beethoven composers he is the clearest in ideas and the wisest in expression. It is known that Frenchmen are distinguished for this clearness of idea, but with Berlioz the clarity is almost always joined with a plus sign; the ideas were worth the expression. If the Fantastic Symphony is listened to from the program point of view, irritation is apt to set in very early in the hour-long exposition of the effects of opium; but if it be listened to simply as music there is nothing but delight, and a little earache! It is probable that Berlioz was as learned as those who have followed him, but what a wisely artistic use he makes of his learning, and even when he is noisiest how logical and appealing he is, compared with Richard Strauss and his followers! If we must be stunned physically with the mass of sound, how much pleasanter is it to face an artist in his frenzy than a herd of bellowing bulls!

The Litolff concert symphony is not to be blamed because it is old-fashioned, but because it sounds old-fashioned. One is forced into the humiliating position of listening to it with sighing regret and some pitying toleration, and this is not the way to enjoy music. The work suggests that it was written on principle, and not from inspiration, and it suggests that Litolff could have kept on writing in the same way until his paper was exhausted, or he had lost the use of his hands through overwork. The third movement is pretty, and there is brilliant work throughout, but it is the external brilliancy born of fiction, and not the internal brilliancy born of soulful vanity. It may be that the mild radiance of Litolff's moon suffered by coming after the sun of Berlioz's genius, but whatever the reason, the work pleased, but did not impress. Madame Wienzkowska played it with grace, delicacy and spirit, and she is one in the long list of artists who have helped to distinguish the dying years of our century as the era of pianoforte players. She does not stand in the front rank, either on the side of technique or of art, but she plays in a good, workmanlike manner. She has taste and well-trained fingers. In piano playing the good no longer attracts attention, the surprising has so long been served out to us, and so liberally that we have become arrogantly indifferent to everything but the best. Mme. Wienzkowska received hearty applause from the audience that listened to her with great pleasure.

The next concert is the last of the season. The program is Symphony No. 3, E-flat major, op. 55, Beethoven: Overture, "Rienzi," Prelude, and Isolde's "Love Death," Prelude Act III, "Lohengrin; Overture, "Tannhauser," Wagner.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1898.

There can never be any doubt that the music which Berlioz wrote for a given scene expressed the spirit and the passion of it, though some moods unquestionably found stronger and more vivid expression through his pan than others. At the penultimate concert of the season Mr. Paur brought forward the "Fantastic" symphony, which is in a certain way a pendant to the "Harold," inasmuch as though each moves an individuality. But in the "Harold" there is a pensive, quiet, almost melancholy wanderer, who passes through successive scenes quite unaffected by them; while in this other work the dreamer beholds the creature of his devotion swept away from him to become an integer in groupings which he cannot enter, the cause of his own horror, and at last a figure in the wild rites of a Walpurgis night. The symphony comes close to the line which separates the emotional from the sensational; but the eloquence, the mastery of art and the splendid command of means save it. This performance was superb in all respects,—dramatic as well as musical—and the virtuosity of the orchestra was luminously demonstrated in the many strange and difficult tasks distributed through the score. This work began the programme, and a fine reading of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, the delicate pianissimo parts of which received notable care, ended it.

Between these was placed the "Dutch National' concerto-symphony of Litolff, which is no very lofty or beautiful accomplishment. Its first movement goes heavily, its second is a sweet but not deep romance, and its last is lively enough but superficial. There is good skill in the workmanship and the various parts fit nicely together, however. The solo pianoforte was played by Mme. Melanie Wienzkowska, a beautiful and graceful woman and a pleasant player, but apparently not one of the first rank, in spite of her command of pure tone, quick fingers and some concentrated strength.

The last programme will be: Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and from Wagner four well worn selections, which might well have been let to rest until next year—the "Rienzi" overture, the usual prelude and and love-death of "Tristan and Isolde," the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin," and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1898.

Symphony Concert.

The Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony, Litolff's "Dutch National" concerto for pianoforte, and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe" made up the program for the 23d symphony concert last week. Mme Wienzkowska was the soloist. The Berlioz symphony is well named "Fantastic," for the motif of the story it illustrates is set to music in which portions of the instrumentation appear at first to be errors in scoring made by the composer. A close analysis of these seeming irregularities, though, show that Berlioz intended to write as he did, a note in his manuscript to that effect substantiating the correctness of this notation. An "episode in the life of an artist," who sees visions while under the influence of a narcotic, calls for a fantastical treatment, musically, and there is no doubt that Berlioz gave free rein to his imaginative and creative powers in building up his dramatic tone poem.

The stupendous difficulties in the first part of the opening movement and the entire fourth and fifth movements are well known, and as these obstacles were admirably surmounted by the orchestra a general commendation is due the whole performance of the work. The "conversation" work of the flute, clarinets and horns was particularly pleasing, their tones being pure and each harmonizing perfectly with its companions. The percussion and fortissimo effects were as noisy and sonorous as one cares to hear in a hall.

Mme Melanie Wienzkowska, the piano soloist, displayed an admirable technique in the Litolff concerto, but she was lacking in the necessary power to show her abilities against the great orchestral background. Her pianissimo phrases were almost inaudible to the majority of the auditors. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture was given with brilliancy by the orchestra, the performance calling for no special encomiums.

For the close of the symphony concerts this week the program will comprise Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Wagner's "Rienzi" and "Tannhauser" overtures and excerpts from "Tristan" and "Lohengrin."

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1898.

* *

The program of the 23d Symphony concert given last night in Music Hall, Mr. Paur, conductor, was as follows:

Fantastic Symphony No. 1. . . . . Berlioz
Piano concerto No. 3. Litolff
Overture, "Euryanthe" . . . . Weber

The fantastic symphony of Berlioz was finely read and it was played with great spirit and effect. It is a marvelous work when you remember that it was written over 60 years ago, and it would be marvelous if it were written today. I do not say that the flight of imagination never falters; there are moments when Berlioz wanders in thought; then there is that wondrous nightmare, the March to the Scaffold, one of the most gigantic pages of orchestral literature.

Poor Litolff's concerto is old, very old. It was written in 1846, and it was first played here by Jaell in 1853. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler played it during the reign of Nikisch in 1889, probably for the sake of the scherzo. This same scherzo is the only movement that has today a semblance of life. The finale was omitted last night, and the order of the scherzo and andante was inverted. What an andante! It should be played by an orchestra in old-fashioned court dress and with a pianist adorned by a cameo brooch. Mrs. Wienzkowska was heard here last season at a Kneisel concert. She has good fingers and a lady-like touch.

* * *

The program of the last concert of this season will be as follows: Beethoven's "Eroica symphony" and these pieces by Wagner: Overture "Rienzi," prelude to Tristan and Isolde's love death, prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin," overture to "Tannhäuser."

Philip Hale.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1898.
(Copyright, 1898, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth and last Symphony concert of this, the seventeenth season, was given last evening in Music Hall. There was no soloist. The first part of the programme consisted of Beethoven's symphony in E flat, No. 3, the "Heroic."

Mr. Paur had an ovation at the close of the concert, which completes his fifth year with this orchestra.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1898.

The program of the twenty-third Symphony concert was as follows:

Fantastic Symphony. . . . . Berlioz
Piano Concerto, No. 3. . . . . Litolff
Overture, Euryanthe. . . . . Weber

Mrs. Mélanie Wienzkowska made her first appearance in Boston at a Kneisel concert, March 8, 1897, when she played with Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder Schumann's Trio in F major. She appeared last night for the first time at a Symphony concert. I wish for her own sake that she had chosen some other concerto, for outside of the scherzo there is little in the work that has now even the semblance of life. Yet there is a curious story attached to the concerto. It was written in Amsterdam in 1846. At the beginning of that year Litolff went to England to arrange family matters—to procure a separation from his wife, who had not lived with him for several years. The parents of the young woman lured him to London, where an action of law was brought against him, and he was condemned to pay a large sum. Litolff did not have the money, and he was imprisoned for debt. After a few months he escaped to Holland, where he was most successful as pianist and composer. And as a tribute of gratitude he chose the Dutch national anthem for the subject of the finale of this concerto. The finale was omitted last night.

The concerto was first played here by Jaell in 1846. I remember Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler playing it in 1889, the first season conducted by Mr. Nikisch. Lord, what a swollen, puffed-up thing, with tawdry ornamentation, the first movement is! It has the substance of a paper bag. The andante is too sweet for anything, and when the horn begins to sob the solo beer drinkers no longer rattle glasses. The scherzo gives more opportunity to the pianist.

Mrs. Wienzkowska has well disciplined fingers, a clear, agreeable touch. She plays with musical intelligence and with an air of good breeding that may well be called elegance.

The symphony was played effectively. To me the feature of the performance was that wondrous nightmare, the "March to the Scaffold," such a march as might have been marched by strange spirits in the City of Dreadful Night.

* * *

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1898

The Promenade Concerts

The regret which prevails at the close of each Symphony season is very materially tempered by the announcement of the Music Hall promenade concerts which follow at an interval of a week. Those who have attended the Symphony concerts find upon the programmes enough of their favorite selections to continue their allegiance, while the general public, rather more partial to popular and lighter numbers, add their presence to the goodly throng. So everybody in the musical and social world is satisfied, and another season brings its testimony to the unfailing popularity of these concerts.

If one looks closely for the secret of this success, perhaps a greater part could be found in the quality of performance of the orchestra, made up of fifty of the same musicians who have sustained the reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The power of good music could not be better shown than in the prevailing quiet among an audience rather predisposed to independence of action, when any favorite selection is being given.

Everything this season will be conducted in very much the old way. There will be the usual reserved tables, and seats in the first balcony at the side. There will also be a generous number of unreserved tables and the entire second balcony given up to the holders of admission tickets. While there will be no attempt at startling changes in the way of interior decorations, an effort in the direction of novelty and attractiveness will be made. All the special features of the previous season will as far as possible be repeated.

As has been the custom for several seasons past, the conductor will again be selected from the ranks of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the announcement will be received with pleasure that Mr. Max Zach, who for the past three seasons has won many friends, will again conduct. Mr. Zach has shown a very commendable intention to gratify all tastes, as evidenced by the earlier programmes already in preparation.

As for the past three seasons, the business management will be under the direction of Assistant Manager F. R. Comee. The sale of tickets begins at Music Hall on Monday, May 9, at nine o'clock.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1898

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique, No. 1, in C major, opus 14a.
Litolff: Concerto-Symphonie for Pianoforte, No. 3, in E-Flat major, "National Hollandois," opus 45.
Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."
Mme. Mélanie Wienzkowska was the pianist.

The performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic" was in many ways very fine indeed. The first three movements were beautifully given; especially in the Ball-scene did our orchestra outdo itself in delicacy and rhythmic vivacity. That dangerous place where the waltz-theme, played by the woodwind, holds back a little as it alights upon the subdominant went to perfection. The March to the Scaffold, on the other hand, did not seem to us to produce its full effect. Whether it was that the cymbals twice failing to make their entrance on a characteristic effect interrupted the continuity of impression, or that the movement was played with less vigor of accent than we have heard it before we certainly did not get the lift from the music that we usually do. The bells in the finale were sadly out of tune—indeed, no pains seemed to have been taken to have them in tune at all—and it was a mistake to have them placed behind the stage; you could hardly hear them. But, with this exception, the movement went with enormous vim and effectiveness. The composition itself wears wonderfully well. The world has long since outgrown the boyish triviality of its programme, as it has outgrown a good many of the would-be-poetic rabidities of the 1830 movement in France; but it has not outgrown the genius with which the young Berlioz turned this programme into music, and bids fair not to outgrow it for some time more to come. When we consider how little Berlioz knew of the great symphonic literature of the world at the time he wrote this "Fantastic" symphony—Beethoven's ninth was not published then—his musical conception seems little short of superhuman in its vastness. Surely so largely planned a slow movement had never been heard in France before. And, with all the questionable points in the work, splendid genius shows itself on every page.

It seems to us a mistake to have the "Fantastic" on a programme when there is any solo work to be done. The symphony is too long and taxing to the listener to come properly anywhere but at the beginning of a concert, and to force a solo-player to appear immediately after that "Witches' Sabbath" is sheer cruelty. Moreover, Litolff's Dutch concerto is perhaps the last work one wants to hear in such a connection today. The concerto is, upon the whole, a stronger work than might have been expected from Litolff, who was an able musician enough, but no heavyweight. There is a rather unusually strong thread of harmony running through the first movement; the Dutch tunes he introduces in the scherzo and the finale are capital in themselves, and he uses them with great skill; the whole scherzo is distinctly clever, it rises well above the second-rate level. Where the work has aged irreparably is in its second themes, in its sentimental cantilenas; the slow movement, in spite of some clever and very beautiful effects of modulation, has the Henri Herz taint; that sort of tune is dead now. Mme. Wienzkowska, for some reason or other, did not play the finale, and took the slow movement before the scherzo. In the three movements she did play she made a distinctly good impression. She has not the most sympathetic touch in the world, but has all-sufficient strength and technique. Her phrasing is especially fine and expressive; Litolff's cantilenas do not afford much opportunity for the expression of deep feeling, but they can be played poignantly, and in this Mme. Wienzkowska rose to the full height of her opportunity. Her rubato is particularly good, a real rubato, not merely a dragging of the rhythm without compensation afterward. She well deserved the warm recall given her at the end. The accompaniment was rather slovenly, the orchestra playing as they sometimes do when they want to show themselves superior to a work. The wrong tuning of the kettle-drums, by the way, gave a strangely Fafnerian tinge to the opening measures of the first movement; the tonic could pass muster, at a pinch, but the dominant was uncanny.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture was played with a will, but with no exaggerated distinction. The too slow second theme was not pleasant.

The next programme is: Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," opus 55; Wagner, overture to "Rienzi;" prelude and Isoldens Liebestod, from "Tristan und Isolde;" Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin;" overture to "Tannhäuser."

[04]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1898.

The Symphony Season of 1897-1898.

Notes and Comments on Pieces, Singers and Players.

The seventeenth season of the Symphony Orchestra closed last night.

These orchestral pieces were heard in Boston for the first time:

Glazounoff: Lyric Poem, Oct. 16.
Loeffler: Symphonic Poem, "Death of Tintagiles," Jan. 8, March 19.
Massenet: Music to "Les Erinnyes," Jan. 15.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: "Russian Easter," Oct. 23.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: "Antar," March 12.
Strauss (Richard): "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Oct. 30.
Strube: Concerto for violin and orchestra, Dec. 11.
Tschaikowsky: Italian Caprice, Oct. 23.

These concertos were heard for the first time at these concerts:

Gernsheim: Violin concerto in D major, Oct. 23; Paganini-Gorski, caprice A minor, Jan. 15; Tschaikowsky, piano concerto No. 2, Feb. 5.
Humperdinck's prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel" and Chabrier's "Espana" were played at these concerts for the first time.

⁂

The soloists who made their appearance for the first time at these concerts were:

Singers: Mrs. Titus (Oct. 30), Miss Stein (Nov. 27), Mr. Staudigl (Jan. 1), Mr. Ffrangcon Davies (March 19), Mrs. Jacoby (April 9).
Violinists: Miss Mead, Jan. 29.
Pianists: Mr. Jonas (Nov. 20), Mr. Siloti (Feb. 5), Mrs. Wienzkowska (April 24).

⁂

The soloists in all were as follows:

Singers: Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Jacoby, Miss Stein, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, Mr. Staudigl—6.
Violinists: Messrs. Schnitzler, Kneisel (4), Loeffler (2), Adamowski, Miss Mead—5.
'Cellists: Messrs. Schroeder and Schulz—2.
Pianists: Messrs. Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Jonas, Mrs. Zeisler and Mrs. Wienzkowska—6.

⁂

As a whole, this list of soloists is weak. It might be interesting to make a list of singers and players who did not appear.

Thus Sembrich, Melba, Nordica, Gadski, Plancon, Campanari, Bispham were in the market.

Ysaye, Marteau, Josef Hofmann, Pugno were in the market.

Nordica, Plancon, Campanari, Ysaye, Marteau, Hofmann,, Pugno appeared at Symphony concerts in other cities.

⁂

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is rich in solo violinists and 'cellists. Each year certain appear with the regularity of a well-behaved comet.

Might it not be well to have fewer soloists, to engage the very best that are to be had?

And is it not true that the standard required for a solo appearance at these concerts is sinking steadily?

It is not necessary to be disagreeable by indulging in retrospective criticism, and yet a glance at the list of soloists of the past season will show that all were not worthy of the honor.

⁂

It must also be confessed that the programs, as a rule, were poorly arranged, and were too often uninteresting.

There were brilliant performances, such as that of "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Scheherazade," Tschaikowsky's symphonies, MacDowell's Indian suite, the concertos played by Messrs. Joseffy, Siloti and MacDowell. On the other hand, Brahms as well as Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven suffered.

⁂

I now add a complete list of works performed:

I SYMPHONIES.

Beach. Symphony in E minor, "Gaelic."
Beethoven. Symphony No. 7, Symphony No. 5, Symphony No. 2, Symphony No. 6, Three movements from Symphony No. 9, Symphony No. 8, Symphony No. 3.
Berlioz. Symphonie fantastique.
Brahms. Symphony No. 3, Symphony No. 4, Symphony No. 1.
Dvořák. Symphony No. 5.
Haydn. Symphony in C major, "l'Ours," opus 66. Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13).
Mendelssohn. Symphony No. 3.
Mozart. Symphony No. 46, in D major (Köchel, No. 504). Symphony, "Jupiter."
Raff. Symphony, "Im Walde."
Rimsky-Korsakoff. Symphony No. 2, "Antar."
Schubert. Unfinished symphony.
Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major. Symphony No. 4, in D minor.
Sgambati. Symphony No. 1, in D major.
Tschaikowsky. Symphony No. 5. Symphony, "Pathétique."

II. SUITES AND SERENADES.

Bizet. "L'Arlésienne," Suite No. 1.
Brahms. Serenade No. 1, in D major.
Dvořák. Suite in D major.
Grieg. Four Movements from Suite No. 2, "Peer Gynt."
MacDowell. Suite, "Indian."
Massenet. Music to "Les Erinnyes."
Mozart. Four Movements from Serenade No. 7, "Haffner."
Rimsky-Korsakoff. Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."
Schumann. Ouverture, Scherzo und Finale, opus 52.

III. OVERTURES, PRELUDES, AND SYMPHONIC POEMS.

Auber. Overture to "La Part du Diable." Overture to "Le Domino noir."
Beethoven. Overture to "Leonore," No. 2. Overture, "Zur Weihe des Hauses. Overture to "Leonore," No. 3. Overture to "Egmont."
Berlioz. Overture, "Le Carnaval romain."
Brahms. Akademische Fest-Ouverture."
Chabrier. Prelude to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
Dvořák. Overture, "Carneval."
Glazounoff. Lyric Poem for Orchestra.
Humperdinck. Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel."
Loeffler. Symphonic Poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," MS.
Mendelssohn. Overture to "Ruy Blas." Overture, "Meeresstille und glueckliche Fahrt."
Meyerbeer. Overture to "Struensee."
Mozart. Overture to "Die Zauberfloete."
Rimsky-Korsakoff. Overture, "La Grande Pâque Russe."
Smetana. Overture to "Prodaná nevesta." Symphonic Poem, "Vltava."
Strauss, Richard. Symphonic Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra."
Tschaikowsky. Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." Overture, "1812."
Wagner. Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Overture to "Rienzi." Introduction to Act III. of "Lohengrin." Prelude to "Tristan und Isolde." Overture to "Tannhaeuser."
Weber. Overture to "Euryanthe."

IV. CONCERTS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS.

Beethoven. Romanza for Violin, in F major, (T. Adamowski).
Gernsheim. Concerto for Violin, in D major, (Schnitzler).
Goltermann. Cantilena for 'Cello and Orchestra (Schulz).
Litolff. Concerto-Symphonie No. 3, (Mrs. Wienzkowska).
Loeffler. Fantastic Concerto for 'Cello and Orchestra, MS. (Schroeder).
MacDowell. Concerto for Piano, No. 2, (MacDowell).
Paderewski. Concerto for Piano, in A minor, (Jonas).
Paganini. Caprice for Violin, opus 1, arranged by Ladislas Gorski, (T. Adamowski).
Popper. Dance of Sylphs for 'Cello and Orchestra (Schulz).
Saint-Saëns. Concerto for Violin, No. 3, (Miss Mead).
Concerto for Piano, No. 4. (Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler).
Strube. Concerto for Violin, in G major, (Kneisel).
Tschaikowsky. Concerto for Piano, No. 2, (Siloti). Concerto for Piano, No. 1, (Joseffy).

V. SCENAS, ARIAS, ETC., WITH ORCHESTRA.

David. Félicien. Bird Song, from "La Perle du Brésil", (Mrs. Titus).
Gluck. Recitative and Aria, "Che farò senza Euridice," from "Orfeo," (Mrs. Jacoby).
Handel. Recitative and Aria, from "Acis und Galatea." (Staudigl). Recitative and Aria, from "Alessandro" (Mrs. Henschel).
Mozart. Recitative, "Non parventar," and Aria, "Infelice," from "Il Flauto magico" (Mrs. Titus).
Sullivan. "Woo thou thy snowflake," from "Ivanhoe" (Ffrangcon-Davies).
Tschaikowsky. Recitative and Aria, "Lebt wohl, ihr Berge," from "Die Jungfrau von Orleans" (Miss Stein).
Wagner. Scena and Aria, "In Seiner Bluethe," from "Rienzi" (Miss Stein). Wotans Abschied and Feuerzauber, from "Die Walkuere" (Ffrangcon-Davies).
Weber. Scena and Aria, "Schweigt, glueh'nden Sehnens wilde Triebe," from "Euryanthe" (Staudigl).

VI. MISCELLANEOUS.

Bach. Pastoral Symphony from the Christmas Oratorio.
Berlioz. Menuet des Feu-follets, Valse des Sylphes and Marche hongroise, from "La Damnation de Faust."
Chabrier. Rhapsody for Orchestra, "Espana."
Grieg. Two Northern Melodies for Strings.
Rubinstein. Ballet Music from "Der Daemon."
Tschaikowsky. Italian Capriccio for Orchestra, opus 45.
Wagner. Kaisermarsch. Der Ritt der Walkueren, from "Die Walkuere." Isoldens Liebestod, from "Tristan und Isolde."
Weber. Invitation to the Dance, arranged by Weingartner.

⁂

Composers of orchestral and instrumental works, counting Mr. Loeffler as an American citizen, are thus distributed: German, 18; French, 6; American, 3; Russian, 3; Italian, 2; Bohemian, 2; Norwegian, 1; Pole, 1.

The number of instrumental performances according to nationality are, German, 45; Russian, 10; French, 9; American, 6; Bohemian, 3; Italian, 2; Norwegian, 1; Pole, 1.

⁂

It is to be regretted that the names of more modern French composers do not appear on the program: thus Vincent d'Indy and Charpentier are apparently unknown, and the Belgian school is entirely overlooked.

Beethoven led with 12 performances, Wagner followed with 9, then came Tschaikowsky with 8.

⁂

The next symphony concert will be given Oct. 15. The auction sale of season tickets will be as follows:

Friday afternoon public rehearsals—$12 tickets, Monday, Sept. 26, 1898, at 10 A. M.; $7 50 tickets, Tuesday, Sept. 27, 1898, at 10 A. M.

Saturday evening concerts—$12 tickets, Thursday, Sept. 29, 1898, at 10 A. M.; $7 50 tickets, Friday, Sept. 30, 1898, at 10 A. M.

⁂

Mr. Emil Paur's contract as conductor has expired.

The name of the conductor of the 18th season has not yet been announced.

⁂

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 121.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1898.

CLOSING SYMPHONY CONCERT.

M. Paur Recalled Again and Again by the Audience.

A Prolonged Demonstration of Appreciation Is Accorded the Conductor as the Last Notes Die Away—The Concert Itself Proves One of Exceptional Brilliancy.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening brought the 17th season of the organization to its appointed close. The programme was:

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica"..........Beethoven
Overture, "Rienzi"....................Wagner
Prelude and "Isolde's Love Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"..............Wagner
Introduction to act 3 of "Lohengrin"...Wagner
Overture, "Tannhauser"................Wagner

There was a very large audience, as is usual on these annual leave-takings. Mr. Paur, on his first appearance, was received with prolonged, enthusiastic acclaim, and throughout the whole concert he was greeted with the heartiest of plaudits of every fitting movement that presented itself.

The concert was of exceptional brilliancy. A noble reading was accorded the symphony. No liberties were taken, and no attempt was made to misinterpret the score in a modern spirit. In the Wagner selections, Mr. Paur again emphasized his thorough understanding of the composer with splendid results.

The orchestra was at its best in its wonderful technique, the only fault that could be found with it being the frequent variations from true pitch in the wood-wind, but this was probably owing to the cold air that made its way through the doors into the almost stifling, heated atmosphere of the auditorium. At the close of the concert there was a stormy demonstration of appreciation for Mr. Paur. He was recalled again and again, amid shouts, plaudits and the waving of handkerchiefs, and he seemed deeply moved in bowing his acknowledgments, whether by way of adieu or aurevoir remains yet to be determined. It was observed that the bulk of the orchestra hastened away as soon as their duties were over, without waiting to pay any tribute to their conductor. It would perhaps have been better taste to have remained and joined in the applause, especially as they are never lacking in zeal to bestow their plaudits upon all soloists, good, bad and indifferent, who appear at these concerts, reserving their most ardent demonstrations for those selected from their own ranks.

Good feeling, courtesy and tact would have been displayed if they had taken advantage of the only opportunity afforded them of similarly honoring their conductor, particularly on an occasion that in all likelihood ended his connection with them.

A brief resume of the season will be found in the musical department in another column.

Serious Work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Is Conductor Paur to Retire?—Third Week of Opera in English at Boston Theatre—The Wilbur Opera Company—Zerrahn Testimonial—Promenade Concerts.

A SUMMARY of the work done by the Boston Symphony orchestra during its 17th season, just closed, may not be without interest. A careful consideration of the programmes will show that, as a whole, the music performed during the season shows a somewhat broader eclecticism in point of taste than has generally been the rule at these concerts. Of course, it was inevitable that works by German composers should prevail, for these must form the backbone of any season of classical orchestral music; but France, Italy and Russia have found a fair representation. Beethoven had the largest representation with 12 works. These included the 2d, 3d, 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th symphonies and three movements of the 9th symphony. Wagner came next with nine compositions. Tschaikowsky was represented by eight works; Berlioz, Brahms and Mozart by five each; Dvorak, Mendelssohn, Korsakoff, Schumann and Weber, by three each; Auber, Chabrier, Grieg, Handel, Haydn, Loeffler, MacDowell, Saint-Saens and Smetana by two each, and Bach, Mrs. Beach, Bizet, F. David, Gernsheim, Glazounoff, Gluck, Goltermann, Humperdinck, Litolf, Massenet, Meyerbeer, Paderewski, Paganini, Popper, Raff, Rubinstein, Schubert, Sgambati, Strube, Richard Strauss and Sullivan by one each.

Russian composers came into marked prominence, with 12 works. The compositions head for the first time in Boston were nine in number, as follows: Rhapsody for orchestra, "Espana," by Chabrier; concerto fr vilin, op. 92, Gernsheim; lyric poem for orchestra, op. 12, Glazounoff; symphonic poem, "La Mort de Tintagiles," Loeffler; overture, "La Grande Pague Russe," op. 36, and symphony No. 2, "Antar," Rinsky Korsakoff; "Avo Sprach Zarathustra," Richard Strauss; concerto for violin in G, op. 13, Gustav Strube; Italian Capriccio, Tschaikowsky.

American and resident composers were represented by six works: Mrs. H. H. A. Beach in the "Gaelic" symphony, Mr. C. M. Loeffler in "La Mort de Tintagiles," and the fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra; Mr. E. A. MacDowell, in the "Indian" suite, and the concerto, No. 2, in E minor, for piano and orchestra, and Mr. Gustav Strube, in the concerto for violin in G major

The instrumental soloists independently of those of the Symphony orchestra were the pianists, Rafael Josefy, Alexander Siloti, E. A. MacDowell, Alberto Jones, Mrs. Bloomfield Ziesler, and Mme. Melanie Wienzowska. The violinist was Miss Olive Meade. The vocalists were M. Frangcon-Davies, Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Josephine Jacoby, M. Staudigl, Miss Gertrude May Stein, and Mrs. Marion Titus. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Mr. Isidor Schnitzler, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, and Mr. Leo Schulz.

The orchestra throughout the season has been at the highest stage of efficiency, and Mr. Paur greatly increased the esteem he had won in preceding years by his brilliant capacity and the splendor of the artistic results he achieved.

The programme of the last concert announces that the opening concert of the 18th season will take place on the evening of Oct. 15. Contrary to the custom that has hitherto prevailed, his announcement does not present the name of the conductor for next season, a fact which indicates that it is not yet decided who is to occupy that position. As is generally known, Mr. Paul's contract was for five years, with the privilege, on the part of Mr. Higginson, to renew it for another term of the same length, and in case the contract was not thus renewed, Mr. Paur was to receive $10,000 as compensation. It is evident that there has been no renewal up to date, and that no other conductor has been engaged to replace him, or the name of the newcomer would have appeared in the announcement, according to precedent. The result seems to be that Mr. Paur is kept in a suspense that is not without its humiliating side. His contract binds him to await Mr. Higginson's decision, or to forfeit the $10,000 he is to receive in case he is not re-engaged. If a successor is chosen, Mr. Paur will receive his bonus and retire from the field. If a successor is not chosen, Mr. Paur will resume his position without the bonus. Of course, from a purely business standpoint, there is no fault to be found with this arrangement, but the situation, nevertheless, must be far from pleasant or flattering to Mr. Paur, who is only to remain in case no other desirable conductor is open to an engagement or is willing to come. Under the circumstances it is hard to decide whether or no it would be a compliment to Mr. Paur to express the wish that he may be retained. In any event, if a change should be made, it is quite certain that it will not be easy to replace him with a more able, earnest and musically high-aspiring successor.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1898.

Closing Symphony Concert.

The closing symphony in the 17th season was given last evening in Music hall by Mr Paur. The program was made up of familiar selections, Richard Wagner being represented by excerpts from "Rienzi," "Tristan," "Lohengrin" and "Tannhauser," with Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony to complete the numbers. The audience was very large and enthusiastic, and at the close of the performance Mr Paur was recalled to the platform many times ere he was allowed to retire for the season.

Beethoven's grand work was played with magnificent spirit, the men appearing to be in thorough sympathy with the varying moods of the composer, and following the conductor's beat with great precision and [illegible]. The march movement was specially effective, the massiveness of the instrumentation being given with all due pomp and majesty by the band. The scherzo brought out admirable work in the horn contingent, and the peculiarities of the finale were smoothly played and not exaggerated in coloring.

Of the four Wagner numbers, the "Rienzi" overture aroused the most applause, and deservedly so, for it was interpreted with a brilliancy that was really inspiring. The horn phrases were prominent also for clarity of tone in this selection. The "Tannhauser" overture was played in a commendable manner, but with a tendency to carelessness at times on the part of the strings.

In the summary of the season's work published in the program, it is shown that 99 compositions were played by the orchestra; 18 soloists appeared, of which five were symphony men; Beethoven led the list of composers with 12 performances, Wagner following, with nine numbers to his credit.

The next season will open Friday afternoon, Oct 14.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAY 2, 1898.

The Final Symphony Concert of the Season.

A Cordial Farewell to Director Paur by the Audience.

The different musical organizations are posting up their books and closing up their affairs for the season of 1897-8.

The final symphony concert always excites especial interest, and the concert of Saturday drew forth an immense audience, spite of the fact that the programme was purely orchestral, was somewhat longer than usual, and that many were obliged to stand through its numbers, since all the seats were sold. There was evidently great interest in the programme and few left the hall until the final notes had been played and due recognition given to Mr. Paur.

The beginning and end of the concert were fitted to an occasion somewhat above the ordinary. The opening number was the Heroic Symphony. The work received a great performance. In the first movement the rather slow allegro taken was suited to the character of the composition, the themes were well defined, and the gusts of passion, the moments of combat, were powerfully drawn.

We were especially delighted with the stormy energy of the development and the way in which Mr. Paur shades the clash of two irreconcilable harmonies at its close; here the horn enters with the tonic chord while the violins are playing the dominant harmony; it suggests the hero (in this instance Napoleon Bonaparte) clinging to his purpose under any and all circumstances; this clash of harmonies was not emphasized, but by a diminution of the force of the violins and an accentuation of the horn the passage was made to seem musical,—which it is not.

The funeral march, the one which Coleridge called a march in purple, is always the greatest of its kind; the "Siegfried Funeral March" is not a march at all, and, while Chopin's Funeral March may be called the greatest piano expression of its kind, and while the slow movement of Schumann's piano quintette, Op. 44, towers over all funereal chamber music, the great expression of orchestral sorrow is found here.

Naturally the oboe, the instrument of tears and feminine grief, is very prominent in the picture, and it was played splendidly in this performance. But Beethoven does not give us wholly sobs and tears; he avoids a Gummidge-like picture or a presentation of one of Thackeray's moist heroines; a more earnest brooding is well-contrasted with the poignant grief, and the violoncello gave this martial sorrow in excellent style, while the final orchestral sigh was given as such a climax ought to be.

The horns deserve commendation for the way in which they played the Trio of the Scherzo. This same Scherzo, in connection with what precedes it becomes something of a puzzle; probably Berlioz's idea is the true one, that it pictures the world going on with its chatter and bustle of life and forgetting the hero.

The final variations were a fitting climax to this great performance. Here Beethoven shows that he recognized a flaw in the symphonic form. The finales of the old suite, whence the cycle idea of symphony came, were rollicking gigues; Mozart and Haydn, following this idea, nearly always ended their symphonies with a lively dondo; Beethoven gave this jolly rondo spirit (in a sonata-allegro form) in his first symphonic finale; in his second symphony we find him searching for something better and writing a resolute rather than a merry finale; in this great symphony he finds something yet more to his taste and he balances variation in his finale against development in his first movement, and the last trace of the influence of the old Gigue, or Jig, has disappeared.

It was unjust to the memory of Wagner, and it shook the unities somewhat, to follow this noble performance of a great work, with a noisy interpretation of that musical racket known as the "Rienzi Overture." The public evidently liked it, however, circus-band, target-shoot march and all! It received infinitely more applause than was awarded to anything else on the programme.

The beautiful prayer-theme was finely given by violoncellos and violins, and the trumpet also deserves praise for the well-shaded manner in which its blasts were given. Mr. Paur rode on the brass-wind and directed the storm, but the overture was a sort of unconverted Saul among the prophets. The director had laid mines all through the last part of the work, and he exploded them, too!

A good long pause was made here to get the taste out of one's mouth before proceeding to the death of Isolde. How our orchestra plays this noble number every Boston concert-goer knows; but it must be confessed that, without the vocal part, Isolde seems to die a lingering death.

A brilliant performance of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" followed. This is a number where Wagner has reached neutral ground where musician and tune-lover can meet; when "Lohengrin" was being satirized by all the critics, when Wagner was held to be an impossibility at the opera-house, this number had already become popular and was a standard work on the concert repertoire.

Of course our trombones are not allowed to hide their light under a bushel nowadays, and the first theme was thundered out in great power, while the violins were undisturbed by what was once considered very difficult technical work. The number received considerable applause and deserved it, although we feel that a little more repression of the heavy brasses might sometimes be advantageous.

The final number of the concert and of the season was the "Tannhaeuser" overture. It received a very effective performance. Its great conflict between religion, as represented in the Pilgrim's Chorus, and [illegible], as portrayed by the Venus music, [illegible] the mighty triumph of the former [illegible] in as fine a climax as exists in [illegible] given with a dramatic power [illegible] not but awaken enthusiasm. [illegible] have been phlegmatic over this work and it is almost inconceivable that Wagner, even in the riding of his hobby-horses, should have deliberately sacrificed this splendid effect and have cut out the coda in his Paris version of the opera.

Abraham sacrificing his best-beloved Isaac was scarcely more heroic than Wagner sacrificing the climax of his most successful overture, and in the latter-day event the sacrifice was consummated, only, we are glad to add, the world will not accept it and allows the revised version, with its dreary linking to the opera, to remain upon the shelf.

Most gloriously did our violins play the figure that wreathes agitation around the trombone theme; it is one of the most trying passages of the modern school but it was played as if our men had sinews of steel.

The enthusiasm which followed was directed partly to the work, but mostly to a cordial farewell to our director; the musicians rushed away the moment the final note had been played; not so the audience, for Mr. Paur was obliged to come out and bow to the tempest of applause more times than one could readily count. He waved his handkerchief as an adieu, and thus ended the 17th symphonic season.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1898.

The programme for the last Symphony concert of the season was familiar enough, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and from Wagner the "Rienzi" and "Tannhauser" overtures, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin." But the very familiarity of these selections—some of which are annually heard otherwhere than in the Symphony concerts—enabled the listeners to pass judgment more easily upon the truly magnificent work of the orchestra. A musician, much experienced and highly reputed upon the continent, said to us not long ago that in his deliberate opinion this Boston orchestra was the finest in the world. It has never better shown its mastery of the strength, splendor, delicacy, massiveness, expression and assertion which lie waiting in a great instrumental score than in this concert, wherein the range of mere musicianly style and the sweep of emotion was so wide and so absolutely delineated. There was an almost evanescent vocality in the pianissimos in the symphony, and in the funeral march deep gravity and in the scherzo dainty lightness, which were as truly placed and as sympathetically marked, as were the high-strung excitement of the "Rienzi," the conflicts of the "Tannhauser" and the rhapsody and and romance of the other numbers. It was all superb and practically flawless playing, of which conductor and band might all well be proud.

The programme-book gave its usual resume of all the twenty-four programmes, from which it appears that ninety-nine different compositions were played or sung, of which about two-thirds were German, fourteen French, twelve Russian, and six were from Boston pens. The list of works previously unheard was remarkably small—only ten; and of these one was old enough, having been written by Paganini, and one, a concerto by Gernsheim, did not deserve its place. The proportion of programmes in which soloists took part was as usual, three out of four. But these were by no means the most satisfactory. Of all the great musicians who have visited the country, only two were heard—the pianists Jonas and Siloti—such artists as Ysaye, Marteau and Gerardy having been ignored to make room for home players, whose excellent art is indeed uncontestable, but who can be heard twenty times in a season in other concerts. Of the others, several were far from the rank which should be attained by the player or singer to whom the position of a Symphony concert soloist is accorded. Therefore, in respect of new music and true distinction along solo lines, the season was obviously open to criticism, while, on the other hand, in performance it was of the loftiest and most genuine merit.

The announcement of the resumption of the concerts, with Saturday, October 15, as the date for the beginning of the eighteenth season, was also published—but without any conductor's name. This of course intimates that Mr. Higginson may not avail himself of his right to continue Mr. Paur's term for a second five years. Unless some very strong reasons for a change should be presented, it would seem a pity to let Mr. Paur go now; for it is not probable that any man could do more with the orchestra than he, in spite of some faults and flaws in him; and a change means a couple of seasons for assimilation, if not for contention.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
TUESDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1898.

GERICKE TO SUCCEED PAUR.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is to resume the position at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which he retired eight years ago.

Mr. Paur's contract contained a clause leaving it optional with Mr. Higginson to re-engage him for a second term of five years, and stipulating that if he was not so engaged he was to receive the sum of $10,000.

The conditions will be, or have been, fulfilled.

Mr. Paur retires with the warmest esteem and the best wishes of Mr. Higginson.

It is understood that he has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and that he will in all probability take up his residence there.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 122.
MONDAY, MAY 2, 1898.

GERICKE TO SUCCEED PAUR.

Resumes Baton of the Symphony Orchestra.

Long Mooted Question Settled by Return of Well Known Musician Who Was Formerly at Head of the Organization—Mr. Paur to Go to New York.

The long-mooted question regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been definitely settled.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is to resume the position at the head of that organization, from which he retired eight years ago.

Mr. Paur's contract contained a clause leaving it optional with Mr. Higginson to reengage him for a second term of five years, and stipulating that if he was not so engaged he was to receive the sum of $10,000.

The conditions will be, or have been, fulfilled.

Mr. Paur retires with the warmest esteem and the best wishes of Mr. Higginson.

It is understood that he has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and that he will in all probability take up his residence there.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 123.
TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1898.

GERICKE THE CHOSEN MAN.

He Will Again Act as Leader of the Symphony.

Mr. Paur's Successor Decided on—Mr. Gericke Was Conductor of the Orchestra for Five Years Prior to 1890, and Was Popular with Its Patrons.

There is no longer any doubt as to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season. Mr. Emil Paur is to retire with his bonus of $10,000, to which he was entitled in case he was not re-engaged for another term of five years, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is to return to the position at the head of the orchestra which he guided eight years ago.

Much mystery has been preserved regarding this change of conductors, though now the secret is out, a somewhat surprising number of people seem to have known all about it—at least a number of people so claim, perhaps on no foundation.

Mr. Gericke was very popular during the five years that he conducted here, and to him was owing the splendid state of discipline to which the orchestra was brought. In fact, he brought it into shape, and so thoroughly that the influences he exercised over its technique has been felt up to the present time. There can be no doubt that his reception on his return will be of the most cordial character.

Mr. Paur retires with the heartiest esteem of the sincerely musical public, and with a general sincere regret that he is not to remain. It is understood that he has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and in all probability he will take up his residence there and have a leading orchestra under his direction.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1898.

IT IS GERICKE

He Is to Conduct Symphony Orchestra, So It Is Stated—Was Once a Leader of Organization.

Wilhelm Gericke has been selected to succeed Emil Paur as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The foregoing announcement was made Monday, upon the authority of Mr. H. L. Higginson, who also says that Mr. Gericke has accepted an offer to return to his former position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, therefore, severed his connection with the orchestra at the final concert of the 17th season given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, and retires from his position after a continuous service covering five years. Mr. Paur was the fourth conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, which started in 1881 under the leadership of Mr. George Henschel. Mr. Henschel remained three seasons, and was superseded in the fall of 1884 by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who occupied the leader's desk until the close of the season of 1888-89. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then followed, and was replaced by Mr. Paur at the opening of the season of 1893-94. Mr. Gericke has been living in Dresden for several years past, his latest professional engagement as conductor having been in Vienna a number of seasons ago. The announcement of his reappointment comes as a great surprise to Bostonians. Every season rumors of Mr. Paur's displacement by a new man have been flying, but they have come to naught so regularly that no stock has been taken in any statement relating to the Symphony Orchestra, unless it has borne the stamp of Mr. Higginson's authority. As the news of Mr. Gericke's return comes directly from Mr. Higginson himself, the matter may be considered settled for good and all.

It is understood that Mr. Paur has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and that he will in all probability take up his residence there. This probably means that he will succeed the late Anton Seidl as director of the Philharmonic Society.

And now the secret is out. It is Gericke. More Paur to his elbow!

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 127.
SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1898.

The return of Mr. Gericke to the conductorship of the Symphony orchestra, after eight years' absence, is as great an experiment as the marriage of a widow with her first love. Years have certainly changed them both. The glamour of youth has died out; there are signs of maturity, of mutual independence, that can bode no good to the new menage, however romantic its construction, and outsiders may well speculate on the wisdom of "going back" in Time's tracks. Yes, it is a risk to recall the past to life. Freshen it up as one may with pleasant memories, it is really as dead as a door nail. The experiment is only successful when an entirely new set of feelings are to be engrossed in the maintenance of harmony. As far as the Symphony audience's happiness is concerned, it must wipe out all past impressions, and accept its "old love" without comparisons with the departed. One wonders how the rehearsal girls will like the change. Nikisch was always their idol, at least until Mrs. Nikisch appeared on the scene, and it has always been a grievance, in regard to Mr. Paur, that he was so indifferent to their fair presence on Friday afternoons. But now, here comes Mr. Gericke, protected by Mrs. Gericke and two youngsters of tender years! It is too sad for words. If susceptible Boston audiences had their say, a Symphony orchestra conductor should take a vow of celibacy, and promise to be, first of all, a society man, before he could be engaged.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAY 2, 1898.

The Final Symphony Concert of the Season.

A Cordial Farewell to Director Paur by the Audience.

The different musical organizations are posting up their books and closing up their affairs for the season of 1897-8.

The final symphony concert always excites especial interest, and the concert of Saturday drew forth an immense audience, spite of the fact that the programme was purely orchestral, was somewhat longer than usual, and that many were obliged to stand through its numbers, since all the seats were sold. There was evidently great interest in the programme and few left the hall until the final notes had been played and due recognition given to Mr. Paur.

The beginning and end of the concert were fitted to an occasion somewhat above the ordinary. The opening number was the Heroic Symphony. The work received a great performance. In the first movement the rather slow allegro taken was suited to the character of the composition, the themes were well defined, and the gusts of passion, the moments of combat, were powerfully drawn.

We were especially delighted with the stormy energy of the development and the way in which Mr. Paur shades the clash of two irreconcilable harmonies at its close; here the horn enters with the tonic chord while the violins are playing the dominant harmony; it suggests the hero (in this instance Napoleon Bonaparte) clinging to his purpose under any and all circumstances; this clash of harmonies was not emphasized, but by a diminution of the force of the violins and an accentuation of the horn the passage was made to seem musical,—which it is not.

The funeral march, the one which Coleridge called a march in purple, is always the greatest of its kind; the "Siegfried Funeral March" is not a march at all, and, while Chopin's Funeral March may be called the greatest piano expression of its kind, and while the slow movement of Schumann's piano quintette, Op. 44, towers over all funereal chamber music, the great expression of orchestral sorrow is found here.

Naturally the oboe, the instrument of tears and feminine grief, is very prominent in the picture, and it was played splendidly in this performance. But Beethoven does not give us wholly sobs and tears; he avoids a Gummidge-like picture or a presentation of one of Thackeray's moist heroines; a more earnest brooding is well-contrasted with the poignant grief, and the violoncello gave this martial sorrow in excellent style, while the final orchestral sigh was given as such a climax ought to be.

The horns deserve commendation for the way in which they played the Trio of the Scherzo. This same Scherzo, in connection with what precedes it becomes something of a puzzle; probably Berlioz's idea is the true one, that it pictures the world going on with its chatter and bustle of life and forgetting the hero.

The final variations were a fitting climax to this great performance. Here Beethoven shows that he recognized a flaw in the symphonic form. The finales of the old suite, whence the cycle idea of symphony came, were rollicking gigues; Mozart and Haydn, following this idea, nearly always ended their symphonies with a lively dondo; Beethoven gave this jolly rondo spirit (in a sonata-allegro form) in his first symphonic finale; in his second symphony we find him searching for something better and writing a resolute rather than a merry finale; in this great symphony he finds something yet more to his taste and he balances variation in his finale against development in his first movement, and the last trace of the influence of the old Gigue, or Jig, has disappeared.

It was unjust to the memory of Wagner, and it shook the unities somewhat, to follow this noble performance of a great work, with a noisy interpretation of that musical racket known as the "Rienzi Overture." The public evidently liked it, however, circus-band, target-shoot march and all! It received infinitely more applause than was awarded to anything else on the programme.

The beautiful prayer-theme was finely given by violoncellos and violins, and the trumpet also deserves praise for the well-shaded manner in which its blasts were given. Mr. Paur rode on the brass-wind and directed the storm, but the overture was a sort of unconverted Saul among the prophets. The director had laid mines all through the last part of the work, and he exploded them, too!

A good long pause was made here to get the taste out of one's mouth before proceeding to the death of Isolde. How our orchestra plays this noble number every Boston concert-goer knows; but it must be confessed that, without the vocal part, Isolde seems to die a lingering death.

A brilliant performance of the prelude to the third act of "Lohengrin" followed. This is a number where Wagner has reached neutral ground where musician and tune-lover can meet; when "Lohengrin" was being satirized by all the critics, when Wagner was held to be an impossibility at the opera-house, this number had already become popular and was a standard work on the concert repertoire.

Of course our trombones are not allowed to hide their light under a bushel nowadays, and the first theme was thundered out in great power, while the violins were undisturbed by what was once considered very difficult technical work. The number received considerable applause and deserved it, although we feel that a little more repression of the heavy brasses might sometimes be advantageous.

The final number of the concert and of the season was the "Tannhaeuser" overture. It received a very effective performance; its great conflict between religion, as represented in the Pilgrim's Chorus, and vice, as portrayed by the Venus music, with the mighty triumph of the former depicted in as fine a climax as exists in music, were given with a dramatic power that could not but awaken enthusiasm.

It is inconceivable that Schumann should have been phlegmatic over this work and it is almost inconceivable that Wagner, even in the riding of his hobby-horses, should have deliberately sacrificed this splendid effect and have cut out the coda in his Paris version of the opera.

Abraham sacrificing his best-beloved Isaac was scarcely more heroic than Wagner sacrificing the climax of his most successful overture, and in the latter-day event the sacrifice was consummated, only, we are glad to add, the world will not accept it and allows the revised version, with its dreary linking to the opera, to remain upon the shelf.

Most gloriously did our violins play the figure that wreathes agitation around the trombone theme; it is one of the most trying passages of the modern school but it was played as if our men had sinews of steel.

The enthusiasm which followed was directed partly to the work, but mostly to a cordial farewell to our director; the musicians rushed away the moment the final note had been played; not so the audience, for Mr. Paur was obliged to come out and bow to the tempest of applause more times than one could readily count. He waved his handkerchief as an adieu, and thus ended the 17th symphonic season.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1898.

The programme for the last Symphony concert of the season was familiar enough, consisting of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, and from Wagner the "Rienzi" and "Tannhauser" overtures, the Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," and the introduction to the third act of "Lohengrin." But the very familiarity of these selections—some of which are annually heard otherwhere than in the Symphony concerts—enabled the listeners to pass judgment more easily upon the truly magnificent work of the orchestra. A musician, much experienced and highly reputed upon the continent, said to us not long ago that in his deliberate opinion this Boston orchestra was the finest in the world. It has never better shown its mastery of the strength, splendor, delicacy, massiveness, expression and assertion which lie waiting in a great instrumental score than in this concert, wherein the range of mere musicianly style and the sweep of emotion was so wide and so absolutely delineated. There was an almost evanescent vocality in the pianissimos in the symphony, and in the funeral march deep gravity and in the scherzo dainty lightness, which were as truly placed and as sympathetically marked, as were the high-strung excitement of the "Rienzi," the conflicts of the "Tannhauser" and the rhapsody and and romance of the other numbers. It was all superb and practically flawless playing, of which conductor and band might all well be proud.

The programme-book gave its usual resume of all the twenty-four programmes, from which it appears that ninety-nine different compositions were played or sung, of which about two-thirds were German, fourteen French, twelve Russian, and six were from Boston pens. The list of works previously unheard was remarkably small—only ten; and of these one was old enough, having been written by Paganini, and one, a concerto by Gernsheim, did not deserve its place. The proportion of programmes in which soloists took part was as usual, three out of four. But these were by no means the most satisfactory. Of all the great musicians who have visited the country, only two were heard—the pianists Jonas and Siloti—such artists as Ysaye, Marteau and Gerardy having been ignored to make room for home players, whose excellent art is indeed uncontestable, but who can be heard twenty times in a season in other concerts. Of the others, several were far from the rank which should be attained by the player or singer to whom the position of a Symphony concert soloist is accorded. Therefore, in respect of new music and true distinction along solo lines, the season was obviously open to criticism, while, on the other hand, in performance it was of the loftiest and most genuine merit.

The announcement of the resumption of the concerts, with Saturday, October 15, as the date for the beginning of the eighteenth season, was also published—but without any conductor's name. This of course intimates that Mr. Higginson may not avail himself of his right to continue Mr. Paur's term for a second five years. Unless some very strong reasons for a change should be presented, it would seem a pity to let Mr. Paur go now; for it is not probable that any man could do more with the orchestra than he, in spite of some faults and flaws in him; and a change means a couple of seasons for assimilation, if not for contention.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
TUESDAY MORNING, MAY 3, 1898.

GERICKE TO SUCCEED PAUR.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is to resume the position at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from which he retired eight years ago.

Mr. Paur's contract contained a clause leaving it optional with Mr. Higginson to re-engage him for a second term of five years, and stipulating that if he was not so engaged he was to receive the sum of $10,000.

The conditions will be, or have been, fulfilled.

Mr. Paur retires with the warmest esteem and the best wishes of Mr. Higginson.

It is understood that he has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and that he will in all probability take up his residence there.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 122.
MONDAY, MAY 2, 1898.

GERICKE TO SUCCEED PAUR.

Resumes Baton of the Symphony Orchestra.

Long Mooted Question Settled by Return of Well Known Musician Who Was Formerly at Head of the Organization—Mr. Paur to Go to New York.

The long-mooted question regarding the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been definitely settled.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is to resume the position at the head of that organization, from which he retired eight years ago.

Mr. Paur's contract contained a clause leaving it optional with Mr. Higginson to reengage him for a second term of five years, and stipulating that if he was not so engaged he was to receive the sum of $10,000.

The conditions will be, or have been, fulfilled.

Mr. Paur retires with the warmest esteem and the best wishes of Mr. Higginson.

It is understood that he has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and that he will in all probability take up his residence there.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 123.
TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1898.

GERICKE THE CHOSEN MAN.

He Will Again Act as Leader of the Symphony.

Mr. Paur's Successor Decided on—Mr. Gericke Was Conductor of the Orchestra for Five Years Prior to 1890, and Was Popular with Its Patrons.

There is no longer any doubt as to the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra next season. Mr. Emil Paur is to retire with his bonus of $10,000, to which he was entitled in case he was not re-engaged for another term of five years, and Mr. Wilhelm Gericke is to return to the position at the head of the orchestra which he guided eight years ago.

Much mystery has been preserved regarding this change of conductors, though now the secret is out, a somewhat surprising number of people seem to have known all about it—at least a number of people so claim, perhaps on no foundation.

Mr. Gericke was very popular during the five years that he conducted here, and to him was owing the splendid state of discipline to which the orchestra was brought. In fact, he brought it into shape, and so thoroughly that the influences he exercised over its technique has been felt up to the present time. There can be no doubt that his reception on his return will be of the most cordial character.

Mr. Paur retires with the heartiest esteem of the sincerely musical public, and with a general sincere regret that he is not to remain. It is understood that he has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and in all probability he will take up his residence there and have a leading orchestra under his direction.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1898.

IT IS GERICKE

He Is to Conduct Symphony Orchestra, So It Is Stated—Was Once a Leader of Organization.

Wilhelm Gericke has been selected to succeed Emil Paur as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The foregoing announcement was made Monday, upon the authority of Mr. H. L. Higginson, who also says that Mr. Gericke has accepted an offer to return to his former position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, therefore, severed his connection with the orchestra at the final concert of the 17th season given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, and retires from his position after a continuous service covering five years. Mr. Paur was the fourth conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, which started in 1881 under the leadership of Mr. George Henschel. Mr. Henschel remained three seasons, and was superseded in the fall of 1884 by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, who occupied the leader's desk until the close of the season of 1888-89. Mr. Arthur Nikisch then followed, and was replaced by Mr. Paur at the opening of the season of 1893-94. Mr. Gericke has been living in Dresden for several years past, his latest professional engagement as conductor having been in Vienna a number of seasons ago. The announcement of his reappointment comes as a great surprise to Bostonians. Every season rumors of Mr. Paur's displacement by a new man have been flying, but they have come to naught so regularly that no stock has been taken in any statement relating to the Symphony Orchestra, unless it has borne the stamp of Mr. Higginson's authority. As the news of Mr. Gericke's return comes directly from Mr. Higginson himself, the matter may be considered settled for good and all.

It is understood that Mr. Paur has under consideration flattering offers from New York, and that he will in all probability take up his residence there. This probably means that he will succeed the late Anton Seidl as director of the Philharmonic Society.

And now the secret is out. It is Gericke. More Paur to his elbow!

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CIII., NO. 127.
SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1898.

The return of Mr. Gericke to the conductorship of the Symphony orchestra, after eight years' absence, is as great an experiment as the marriage of a widow with her first love. Years have certainly changed them both. The glamour of youth has died out; there are signs of maturity, of mutual independence, that can bode no good to the new menage, however romantic its construction, and outsiders may well speculate on the wisdom of "going back" in Time's tracks. Yes, it is a risk to recall the past to life. Freshen it up as one may with pleasant memories, it is really as dead as a door nail. The experiment is only successful when an entirely new set of feelings are to be engrossed in the maintenance of harmony. As far as the Symphony audience's happiness is concerned, it must wipe out all past impressions, and accept its "old love" without comparisons with the departed. One wonders how the rehearsal girls will like the change. Nikisch was always their idol, at least until Mrs. Nikisch appeared on the scene, and it has always been a grievance, in regard to Mr. Paur, that he was so indifferent to their fair presence on Friday afternoons. But now, here comes Mr. Gericke, protected by Mrs. Gericke and two youngsters of tender years! It is too sad for words. If susceptible Boston audiences had their say, a Symphony orchestra conductor should take a vow of celibacy, and promise to be, first of all, a society man, before he could be engaged.

[106]

OUR NEXT CONDUCTOR

The news that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has been offered, and has accepted, the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season—and probably for longer, though of this there is as yet no official statement—will be hailed with joy by many a music-lover in this city.

There is a peculiar fitness in Mr. Gericke's thus returning to a position he occupied with such honor for five years, till ill health resulting from overwork forced him unwillingly to give it up. The Symphony Orchestra is really, intrinsically his orchestra; he made it, and it properly belongs to him, as his own work. This is an important point, upon which no little stress should be laid. Boston learned (or might have learned) a lesson in this matter a little while ago, when Mr. Theodore Thomas came here with his Chicago orchestra. Now, there is no invidiousness in saying that the material of the Chicago orchestra is decidedly inferior to that of our own; the average excellence of both players and instruments is lower than in our orchestra. This may be readily admitted. But the superlative quality of the technical performance of Mr. Thomas's men showed a carefulness, strength, and unity of leadership unsurpassed in our memory. It was Mr. Thomas's orchestra, he had formed it, built it up, made it what it was; what it knew (as an orchestra) it had learned from him, and from him only. This was the true key to its admirable playing.

Now, our Symphony Orchestra is as much Mr. Gericke's as the Chicago Orchestra is Mr. Thomas's; he formed it, built it up, made it what it is; what it knows (as an orchestra) it learned from him. The history of our Symphony Orchestra has been a peculiar one; neither uninteresting nor uninstructive. Mr. Georg Henschel conducted for the first four years. A thorough musician, with a certain streak of genius in him, he was yet an inexperienced conductor. He was, however, a decidedly magnetic man, born, one would have thought, to sway masses of men. Indeed he gave such convincing evidence of this power, when he conducted an overture of his own at one of the symphony concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, that he unquestionably owed his engagement by Mr. Higginson to this display of it. He showed no little of it, too, at the first concert of the new organization. But, after this, for one reason or another, he seemed quite to lose his grip, his magnetism was gone. The material he had to work with was none of the best, the bulk of it was the old Harvard Orchestra—which Ovide Musin once characterized as "une agregation fortuite d'elements heterogenes (a fortuitous aggregation of heterogeneous elements)"—to which was added some newer and younger blood. Upon the whole, Mr. Henschel did little with it, and taught it little; neither did he show much ambition nor any power as an organizer. He undoubtedly learned a good deal himself from his four years' experience; but he taught the orchestra next to nothing. What changes he made, from time to time, in its personnel were seldom of importance, and he left it in pretty much the condition in which he had found it.

Then came Mr. Gericke. He was a conductor of long experience and thorough technical equipment. Whatever his conception of Mr. Higginson's wishes may have been, his own mind was unquestionably made up on one point from the start: that he would conduct nothing but an absolutely first-class orchestra. Besides being a superb conductor, he was a thoroughly capable organizer. He first tried to get on with what material had been left him by Mr. Henschel. After a while he found that it would not do. The chief trouble was not so much in the individual incapacity of the players for good work as in the fact that most of them, especially the older ones, had either never been taught or had long since forgotten the art of obeying; Mr. Listemann, a very superior artist in his way, was a man of too much impulsive initiative to follow anyone's beat implicitly, and most of the rest had been too long accustomed to having their own way to care to change their habits. Mr. Gericke, however, firmly intended to make himself obeyed, and carried out this intention with a pretty high hand. The personnel of the orchestra was changed almost throughout; old players were discharged, or resigned, one after another, and their places were filled by younger ones. A good deal of talk was made at the time about "un-American autocratism" and "unrepublican one-man-power"; which was, on the whole, about as sensible as if similar objections had been raised against privates in the army being made to obey superior officers. And it was this renewed and obedient orchestra that Mr. Gericke drilled into becoming one of the greatest orchestras of the world.

Next came Mr. Arthur Nikisch, a conductor of real genius, a magnetic swayer of men. Still, under him, the orchestra remained essentially Mr. Gericke's; in point of technique Mr. Nikisch taught it virtually only one thing: to obey his beat at a moment's notice. At rehearsals this was about the only technical point he insisted upon; what else in technique the men had [illegible] what Mr. Gericke had taught them. Mr. Nikisch's object was to turn the orchestra into one great, complex instrument, upon which he could play as he pleased at any time. Next to nothing was ever predetermined at rehearsals; his conductorship showed itself only at perform-

[illegible] they went very badly [illegible] who had sweated blood at [illegible] rehearsals, found Mr. Nikisch's performances more taxing still; few ever knew what that terrible baton was going to do next. But Mr. Nikisch's genius and personal magnetism worked wonders; only he really taught the orchestra next to nothing, it remained Mr. Gericke's orchestra still.

Of Mr. Paur we would say little. He is a thorough musician, an earnest, honest worker. But his conductorship is still too recent to make it easy to say anything about him in the way of criticism. Suffice it that he, too, has really taught the orchestra nothing, has gained no real ascendency over it. It is still Mr. Gericke's orchestra. And to this, his own orchestra we welcome Gericke back with the heartiest greetings, and the fullest confidence. He will be in his right place once more, next October!

SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1.

With the concert given last evening the present season of the symphony concerts closed, and perhaps it may not be entirely unprofitable to set down some thoughts suggested by the occasion. The Symphony orchestra is justly held in affectionate regard by the music loving public of Boston, and a personal interest is felt in the welfare of the organization. Musical art, however, and personal interest are not necessarily synonymous, and it sometimes happens that a curiosity to see acts unfavorably on the desire to hear. One sometimes hears, for example, that interest in the symphony concerts can be maintained only by changing the conductor at the end of every three or four years.

This assertion is a heresy against the highest form of art and, in consequence, its falsity is well worth the proving. A conductor is not a prima donna and a concert is not an opera, and whatever may be our intentions in going to an opera we certainly go to a symphony concert to hear the best music adequately interpreted. We go to satisfy aesthetic taste and not curiosity. It is as false to assert as a principle that it is necessary to change a conductor, as to claim that it is necessary to change the first violinist or the entire orchestra.

The eagerness to see M. Lamoreaux, Herr Richter or Signor Somebody Else is confined to the few, the many are content to take the good as it is, and if among these are not many professional musicians the reticence may be taken for anything but an evidence of justice or sincerity. It is doubtful if in its entire career the Symphony orchestra has had a better conductor than Mr. Paur, or one who has been more eagerly anxious to advance the cause of sound art. No conductor reposes on a bed of violets, and no conductor of worth has ever met with the approval and good will of those who serve under him. Every ambitious musician from the first violinst down to the drummer feels that he was born to be a conductor, and feels the injustice of being compelled to follow where genius indicates that he should lead. Wherever a good conductor is found it will be discovered that the majority of the orchestra are opposed to him, some passively others actively and all ungenerously. The fact is undeniable whatever may be the explanation; and on close investigation it will be generally found that the unfavorable things that are said of a conductor chiefly originate in his own orchestra. Of course this does not apply to our symphony orchestra which is naturally an exception to an otherwise universal rule.

Then there is the difficulty of programme making. The Boston public is impatient of a symphony concert that lasts over one hour and a half, and it is impossible to get much variety in this limited amount of time, especially when a symphony, like the "Fantastic" of Berlioz consumes sixty-five minutes of the time. Innovators suggest that long symphonies should be mutilated to bring them within regulation time; but while something may be said for this on the score of comfort, more may be said against it on the side of art.

Another discomfort against which the conductor must contend is the unjust anger of those whose compositions he is compelled to refuse. Hades has no fury like the musician whose opus six has been rejected. Before his work was scorned he may have been the personal friend of the conductor and publicly praised him for being the very choicest specimen of his kind; after, friendship vanishes and the same lips that uttered noble praise now indulge in ignoble calumny.

Then in many cases the conductor suffers the humiliation of feeling that he is treated like a sack of potatoes or a bale of hay, made to feel as if he were the personal property of those who engage him. There is no profitable art, on the money side, where there is no business, but when a man is master of his profession, when he worthily fills the highest position in his profession it would seem that he should be treated as something more important than so much dry goods, to be held or rejected at the whim of the purchaser. A business transaction that is capable of humiliating a master artist in his own eyes and in those of others is a business transaction that has little to commend it.

The conductor has other annoyances that need not be here set down, but enough has been written to demonstrate that it is unjust to accuse him of faults that are born of the position he holds, the faults for which he should not be blamed. A larger injustice, and this time to the progress of true art, is that a good conductor should be lost through the erroneous belief that our art loving public is yearning for novelty. It is possible that Mr. Paur has his faults; it is probable that some of his critics would perform marvels if they were allowed to wield the baton in their untried hands; but it is still worth repeating that Mr. Paur is the best conductor that has yet appeared before a symphony audience, and the capable few who have had the opportunity of making the comparison unhesitatingly assert that he is the peer of any conductor. Comparison, however, is not necessary, for to all who choose to care and are fit to judge he has shown his rare skill as a conductor, his catholic taste his musicianly knowledge and his large sympathy for our native composers. What a change of conductors may mean, our lovers of music too well know, for they have seen the symphony orchestra sink from its high estate towards nothingness. Mr. Paur has compelled praise even from those who started out with flinging mud at him at any cost, and his real worth may be gauged by comparing the criticisms of the New York newspapers when he first appeared in that city with the criticisms that now greet him. To extort praise from those who came with the deliberate intention to censure is an honor that can be won only by the highest merit, and that honor belongs to Mr. Paur.

Our symphony orchestra is the pride of Boston and the envy of other cities, and as it has won its highest record under its present conductor, it seems unwise to disturb the present happy conditions for the sake of gratifying morbid curiosity or unlovable envy. It is said that the present business relations make it possible to retain Mr. Paur in the position that he has held with so much honor to himself and with so much profit to the progress of his art; and for the sake of art it is to be sincerely hoped that the most strenuous efforts will be made to prevent him from retiring.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 2, 1898

OUR NEXT CONDUCTOR

The news that Mr. Wilhelm Gericke has been offered, and has accepted, the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for next season—and probably for longer, though of this there is as yet no official statement—will be hailed with joy by many a music-lover in this city.

There is a peculiar fitness in Mr. Gericke's thus returning to a position he occupied with such honor for five years, till ill health resulting from overwork forced him unwillingly to give it up. The Symphony Orchestra is really, intrinsically his orchestra; he made it, and it properly belongs to him, as his own work. This is an important point, upon which no little stress should be laid. Boston learned (or might have learned) a lesson in this matter a little while ago, when Mr. Theodore Thomas came here with his Chicago orchestra. Now, there is no invidiousness in saying that the material of the Chicago orchestra is decidedly inferior to that of our own; the average excellence of both players and instruments is lower than in our orchestra. This may be readily admitted. But the superlative quality of the technical performance of Mr. Thomas's men showed a carefulness, strength, and unity of leadership unsurpassed in our memory. It was Mr. Thomas's orchestra, he had formed it, built it up, made it what it was; what it knew (as an orchestra) it had learned from him, and from him only. This was the true key to its admirable playing.

Now, our Symphony Orchestra is as much Mr. Gericke's as the Chicago Orchestra is Mr. Thomas's; he formed it, built it up, made it what it is; what it knows (as an orchestra) it learned from him. The history of our Symphony Orchestra has been a peculiar one; neither uninteresting nor uninstructive. Mr. Georg Henschel conducted for the first four years. A thorough musician, with a certain streak of genius in him, he was yet an inexperienced conductor. He was, however, a decidedly magnetic man, born, one would have thought, to sway masses of men. Indeed he gave such convincing evidence of this power, when he conducted an overture of his own at one of the symphony concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, that he unquestionably owed his engagement by Mr. Higginson to this display of it. He showed no little of it, too, at the first concert of the new organization. But, after this, for one reason or another, he seemed quite to lose his grip, his magnetism was gone. The material he had to work with was none of the best, the bulk of it was the old Harvard Orchestra—which Ovide Musin once characterized as "une agregation fortuite d'elements heterogenes (a fortuitous aggregation of heterogeneous elements)"—to which was added some newer and younger blood. Upon the whole, Mr. Henschel did little with it, and taught it little; neither did he show much ambition nor any power as an organizer. He undoubtedly learned a good deal himself from his four years' experience; but he taught the orchestra next to nothing. What changes he made, from time to time, in its personnel were seldom of importance, and he left it in pretty much the condition in which he had found it.

Then came Mr. Gericke. He was a conductor of long experience and thorough technical equipment. Whatever his conception of Mr. Higginson's wishes may have been, his own mind was unquestionably made up on one point from the start: that he would conduct nothing but an absolutely first-class orchestra. Besides being a superb conductor, he was a thoroughly capable organizer. He first tried to get on with what material had been left him by Mr. Henschel. After a while he found that it would not do. The chief trouble was not so much in the individual incapacity of the players for good work as in the fact that most of them, especially the older ones, had either never been taught or had long since forgotten the art of obeying; Mr. Listemann, a very superior artist in his way, was a man of too much impulsive initiative to follow anyone's beat implicitly, and most of the rest had been too long accustomed to having their own way to care to change their habits. Mr. Gericke, however, firmly intended to make himself obeyed, and carried out this intention with a pretty high hand. The personnel of the orchestra was changed almost throughout; old players were discharged, or resigned, one after another, and their places were filled by younger ones. A good deal of talk was made at the time about "un-American autocratism" and "unrepublican one-man-power"; which was, on the whole, about as sensible as if similar objections had been raised against privates in the army being made to obey superior officers. And it was this renewed and obedient orchestra that Mr. Gericke drilled into becoming one of the greatest orchestras of the world.

Next came Mr. Arthur Nikisch, a conductor of real genius, a magnetic swayer of men. Still, under him, the orchestra remained essentially Mr. Gericke's; in point of technique Mr. Nikisch taught it virtually only one thing: to obey his beat at a moment's notice. At rehearsals this was about the only technical point he insisted upon; what else in technique the men had remained what Mr. Gericke had taught them. Mr. Nikisch's object was to turn the orchestra into one great, complex instrument, upon which he could play as he pleased at any time. Next to nothing was ever predetermined at rehearsals; his conductorship showed itself only at performances. When things went right, they went superbly, when he "missed his tip," as he frequently would do, they went very badly indeed. The players who had sweated blood at Mr. Gericke's rehearsals, found Mr. Nikisch's performances more taxing still; few ever knew what that terrible baton was going to do next. But Mr. Nikisch's genius and personal magnetism worked wonders; only he really taught the orchestra next to nothing, it remained Mr. Gericke's orchestra still.

Of Mr. Paur we would say little. He is a thorough musician, an earnest, honest worker. But his conductorship is still too recent to make it easy to say anything about him in the way of criticism. Suffice it that he, too, has really taught the orchestra nothing, has gained no real ascendency over it. It is still Mr. Gericke's orchestra. And to this, his own orchestra we welcome Gericke back with the heartiest greetings, and the fullest confidence. He will be in his right place once more, next October!

SATURDAY EVENING

Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1.

With the concert given last evening the present season of the symphony concerts closed, and perhaps it may not be entirely unprofitable to set down some thoughts suggested by the occasion. The Symphony orchestra is justly held in affectionate regard by the music loving public of Boston, and a personal interest is felt in the welfare of the organization. Musical art, however, and personal interest are not necessarily synonymous, and it sometimes happens that a curiosity to see acts unfavorably on the desire to hear. One sometimes hears, for example, that interest in the symphony concerts can be maintained only by changing the conductor at the end of every three or four years.

This assertion is a heresy against the highest form of art and, in consequence, its falsity is well worth the proving. A conductor is not a prima donna and a concert is not an opera, and whatever may be our intentions in going to an opera we certainly go to a symphony concert to hear the best music adequately interpreted. We go to satisfy aesthetic taste and not curiosity. It is as false to assert as a principle that it is necessary to change a conductor, as to claim that it is necessary to change the first violinist or the entire orchestra.

The eagerness to see M. Lamoreaux, Herr Richter or Signor Somebody Else is confined to the few, the many are content to take the good as it is, and if among these are not many professional musicians the reticence may be taken for anything but an evidence of justice or sincerity. It is doubtful if in its entire career the Symphony orchestra has had a better conductor than Mr. Paur, or one who has been more eagerly anxious to advance the cause of sound art. No conductor reposes on a bed of violets, and no conductor of worth has ever met with the approval and good will of those who serve under him. Every ambitious musician from the first violinst down to the drummer feels that he was born to be a conductor, and feels the injustice of being compelled to follow where genius indicates that he should lead. Wherever a good conductor is found it will be discovered that the majority of the orchestra are opposed to him, some passively others actively and all ungenerously. The fact is undeniable whatever may be the explanation; and on close investigation it will be generally found that the unfavorable things that are said of a conductor chiefly originate in his own orchestra. Of course this does not apply to our symphony orchestra which is naturally an exception to an otherwise universal rule.

Then there is the difficulty of programme making. The Boston public is impatient of a symphony concert that lasts over one hour and a half, and it is impossible to get much variety in this limited amount of time, especially when a symphony, like the "Fantastic" of Berlioz consumes sixty-five minutes of the time. Innovators suggest that long symphonies should be mutilated to bring them within regulation time; but while something may be said for this on the score of comfort, more may be said against it on the side of art.

Another discomfort against which the conductor must contend is the unjust anger of those whose compositions he is compelled to refuse. Hades has no fury like the musician whose opus six has been rejected. Before his work was scorned he may have been the personal friend of the conductor and publicly praised him for being the very choicest specimen of his kind; after, friendship vanishes and the same lips that uttered noble praise now indulge in ignoble calumny.

Then in many cases the conductor suffers the humiliation of feeling that he is treated like a sack of potatoes or a bale of hay, made to feel as if he were the personal property of those who engage him. There is no profitable art, on the money side, where there is no business, but when a man is master of his profession, when he worthily fills the highest position in his profession it would seem that he should be treated as something more important than so much dry goods, to be held or rejected at the whim of the purchaser. A business transaction that is capable of humiliating a master artist in his own eyes and in those of others is a business transaction that has little to commend it.

The conductor has other annoyances that need not be here set down, but enough has been written to demonstrate that it is unjust to accuse him of faults that are born of the position he holds, the faults for which he should not be blamed. A larger injustice, and this time to the progress of true art, is that a good conductor should be lost through the erroneous belief that our art loving public is yearning for novelty. It is possible that Mr. Paur has his faults; it is probable that some of his critics would perform marvels if they were allowed to wield the baton in their untried hands; but it is still worth repeating that Mr. Paur is the best conductor that has yet appeared before a symphony audience, and the capable few who have had the opportunity of making the comparison unhesitatingly assert that he is the peer of any conductor. Comparison, however, is not necessary, for to all who choose to care and are fit to judge he has shown his rare skill as a conductor, his catholic taste his musicianly knowledge and his large sympathy for our native composers. What a change of conductors may mean, our lovers of music too well know, for they have seen the symphony orchestra sink from its high estate towards nothingness. Mr. Paur has compelled praise even from those who started out with flinging mud at him at any cost, and his real worth may be gauged by comparing the criticisms of the New York newspapers when he first appeared in that city with the criticisms that now greet him. To extort praise from those who came with the deliberate intention to censure is an honor that can be won only by the highest merit, and that honor belongs to Mr. Paur.

Our symphony orchestra is the pride of Boston and the envy of other cities, and as it has won its highest record under its present conductor, it seems unwise to disturb the present happy conditions for the sake of gratifying morbid curiosity or unlovable envy. It is said that the present business relations make it possible to retain Mr. Paur in the position that he has held with so much honor to himself and with so much profit to the progress of his art; and for the sake of art it is to be sincerely hoped that the most strenuous efforts will be made to prevent him from retiring.

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1898.

The season of '97-8 is practically over. The twenty-fourth and last Symphony concert was given last evening. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3, Eroica	Beethoven
Overture to Rienzi	Wagner
Prelude and Isolde's Love-Death, from Tristan and Isolde	Wagner
Introduction to Act III. of Lohengrin	Wagner
Overture to Tannhäuser	Wagner

The air in the hall was so hot and foul that it was a wonder the men could play at all. This undoubtedly explained the occasional false intonation of certain wind instruments. It was Mr. Paur's last concert of a five year contract. He was welcomed warmly and was recalled enthusiastically more than once after the final overture.

The name of the conductor of the next season has not yet been given out. I understand that Mr. Higginson, in a speech to the orchestra last night before the concert, said that he did not know who would be the conductor, and I am told, although the speech seems extraordinary, that he added: "Let us all hope that it will be Mr. Paur." If Mr. Higginson does not know, what is the use of guessing? Will the next conductor come up the harbor, avoiding the mines, drawn by a swan? Or will he fall from heaven like manna?

* * *

These orchestral pieces were heard in Boston for the first time:

Gernsheim, violin concerto in D major (Mr. Schnitzler, October 23); Glazounoff, Lyric Poem, October 16; Loeffler, symphonic poem "Death of Tintagiles," January 8, March 19; Massenet, music to "Les Erinnyes," January 15; Paganini-Gorski, Caprice, A minor (Mr. Adamowski, January 15); Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Russian Easter," October 23; Rimsky-Korsakoff, "Antar," March 12; Strauss (Richard), "Thus Spake Zarathustra," October 30; Strube, concerto for violin and orchestra, December 11; Tschaikowsky, Italian Caprice, October 23.

Humperdinck's prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel," Chabrier's "Espana" and Tschaikowsky's piano concerto No. 2 (Mr. Siloti) were played for the first time at these concerts. They were not new to Boston.

The symphonies played were as follows:

Beach. Symphony in E minor.
Beethoven. Symphonies 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, and three movements from No. 9.
Berlioz. Symphonie Fantastique.
Brahms. Symphonies 1, 3, 4.
Dvorák. Symphony No. 5.
Haydn. Symphony in C major, "l'Ours," op .66; Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13).
Mendelssohn. Symphony No. 3.
Mozart. Symphony No. 46, in D major (Köchel, No. 504). Symphony, "Jupiter."
Raff. Symphony, "Im Walde."
Rimsky-Korsakoff. Symphony No. 2, "Antar."
Schubert. Unfinished Symphony.
Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B flat major; Symphony No. 4, in D minor.
Sgambati. Symphony No. 1 in D major.
Tschaikowsky. Symphony No. 5; Symphony, "Pathetique."

The soloists who made their appearance for the first time at these concerts were:

Singers: Mrs. Titus (October 30), Miss Stein (November 27), Mr. Staudigl (January 1), Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies (March 19), Mrs. Jacoby (April 9).
Violinists: Miss Mead, January 29.
Pianists: Mr. Jonas (November 20), Mr. Siloti (February 5), Mrs. Wienzkowska (April 24).

The soloists in all were as follows:

Singers: Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Titus, Mrs. Jacoby, Miss Stein, Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, Mr. Staudigl—6.
Violinists: Messrs. Schnitzler, Kneisel (4), Loeffler (2), Adamowski, Miss Mead—5.
Cellists: Messrs. Schroeder and Schulz—2.
Pianists: Messrs. Joseffy, Siloti, MacDowell, Jonas, Mrs. Zeisler and Mrs. Wienzkowska—6.

* * *

But think of the list of singers and players that did not appear, although they were in the market—Sembrich, Melba, Nordica, Gadski, Plançon, Campanari, Bispham, Ysaye, Marteau, Gérardy, Pugno, Josef Hofmann. And of these Nordica, Plançon, Campanari, Ysaye, Marteau, Gérardy, Pugno, Hofmann at least appeared at Symphony concerts in other cities.

* * *

The list of soloists as a whole was weak. Five were members of the orchestra.

* * *

Composers of orchestral and instrumental works, counting Mr. Loeffler as an American citizen, were thus distributed: German, 18; French, 6; American, 3; Russian, 3; Italian, 2; Bohemian, 2; Norwegian, 1; Pole, 1.

The number of instrumental performers according to nationality are: German, 45; Russian, 10; French, 9; American, 6; Bohemian, 3; Italian, 2; Norwegian, 1; Pole, 1.

Beethoven led with twelve performances, Wagner followed with nine, then came Tschaikowsky with eight.

* * *

The memorable performances—memorable for brilliance—were those of "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Scheherazade," Tschaikowsky's symphonies and piano concertos, MacDowell's "Indian Suite" and Piano Concerto No. 2, Loeffler's "Death of Tintagiles." The performances of symphonies by Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Brahms were often disappointing, with the exception perhaps of the orchestral movements from Beethoven's ninth.

THE week just ended practically closes the musical season in Boston. The last symphony concert was given to an audience that tested the capacity of Music Hall, and at 8 o'clock Mr. Higginson, who needed an extra seat, could not be accommodated. Standing room was almost at a premium.

Mr. Paur's greetings from the audience were real testimonials of the appreciation and esteem felt for him in Boston, and it is hoped that he will be re-engaged for the coming five years.

Wednesday, July 13
1898.

THE BOURGOGNE DISASTER.

THE tragic deaths of Leon Jacquet, his wife Mina Wetzler-Jacquet, Leon Pourtau, his wife, and Albert Weiss brought sorrow to many last week, when the news of the sinking by collision of La Bourgogne was flashed over the country. In Boston there was deep grief, for the three artists were members of the famous Symphony Orchestra, and both in Cincinnati and New York was the death of Mrs. Jacquet mourned. She was a charming young woman, a gifted pianist and the sister of Herman Hans Wetzler, organist, pianist, composer and conductor, well known here. Their mother resides here. The Boston Herald of Thursday last contained the following:

> A little knot of weeping women stood conversing mournfully before two closed and shuttered cottages on a little side street in Roxbury at twilight last evening. The cottages were the recent homes from which had gone to a swift, unheralded death two entire families.
>
> On Friday last Mr. and Mrs. Leon Jacquet, accompanied by their nine-months-old baby Carl, Mr. and Mrs. Leon Pourtau, Mrs. Vallard, mother of Mrs. Pourtau, and Albert Weiss, bade good-bye to their neighbors in Atherton place and left for New York, en route to Europe. The next day they left New York as first cabin passengers on the ill-fated Bourgogne.
>
> The harrowing story of the sinking of this vessel, containing the additional sad news of the loss of all the first cabin pasengers, came as a heavy blow to these sorrowing residents of the Roxbury district, who had grown to love their genial and talented neighbors.
>
> The men were all members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mrs. Jacquet was an accomplished pianist, and before her marriage, as Minna Wetzler, won many laurels, both in this country and abroad, as a concert soloist. Baby Carl was the pride and delight of the neighborhood. Mr. Jacquet played first flute in the orchestra, Mr. Pourtau first clarinet and Mr. Weiss first oboe. They all were most obliging in giving their neighbors the benefits of their talents, and many an impromptu concert has made life brighter and more enjoyable for the residents of Atherton place.
>
> But for the fact that all the first cabin tickets had been sold another Symphony Orchestra man and resident of Roxbury would have taken passage with his friends on the Bourgogne. Pierre Mueller, first trumpeter in the orchestra, is the fortunate man. He sailed the same day on the Canada. His wife leaves this morning for New York, where she has engaged passage on La Touraine, a sister ship of the lost vessel.
>
> There was consternation at the offices of the Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall Building yesterday morning, when the news of the disaster was received there. Assistant Manager Comee was soon surrounded by other members of the orchestra, personal friends of the three men, and all were shocked at the intelligence.
>
> Mr. Comee said: "It is a great shock to us all. I deeply regret the fact that the men went on this steamer. I knew them very intimately. Aside from my personal sense of the loss, if indeed they have lost their lives, which I still trust has not been the case, it will be a very difficult matter to find artists who can take the places of these men in the orchestra. Mr. Pourtau and Mr. Jacquet were especially fine musicians, ranking with the very best to be found, either in this country or in Europe.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

COLORED PAPER

1

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
592
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 15, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

2

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
794
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 22, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

3

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
143
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 29, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

4

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
790
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 5, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

5

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
295
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 19, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

6

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
441
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 26, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

7

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
227
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 3, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Mana

8

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
363
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 10, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

9

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
225
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 22,1897,AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager

10

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
418
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 31, 1897, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

11

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
544
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 7, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

12

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
733
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 14, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager

13

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
63
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 28, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager

14

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
416
Boston
Symphony
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 4, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manag

COLORED PAPER

15

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
218
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 11, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

16

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
109
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 25, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

17

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
119
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAR. 4, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

18

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
31
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAR. 11, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

19

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
340
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAR. 18, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

20

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
107
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 1, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

21

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
194
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 8, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

22

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
246
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 15, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

23

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
747
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 22, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager.

24

BOSTON MUSIC HALL
443
Boston
Symphony
Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR
CONDUCTOR
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 29, 1898, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis

COLORED PAPER

16
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 39
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, OCT. 16, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

23
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 252
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, OCT. 23, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

30
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 201
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, OCT. 30, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

6
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 7
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, NOV. 6, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager

20
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 60
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, NOV. 20, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

27
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 30
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, NOV. 27, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

4
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 119
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, DEC. 4, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

11
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 52
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, DEC. 11, 1897
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Mana

23
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 57
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
THURSDAY EVENING, DEC. 23, 1897.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

1
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 51
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, JAN. 1, 1898.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

8
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 19
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, JAN. 8, 1898.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

15
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 34
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, JAN. 15, 1898.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

29
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 2
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, JAN. 29, 1898.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

5
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 202
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, FEB. 5, 1898.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

12
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 11
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, FEB. 12, 1898.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

26
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 102
Boston Symphony Orchestra
MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.
ADMISSION
TO FLOOR ONLY.
SATURDAY EVENING, FEB. 26, 1898.
GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

COLORED PAPER

5

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 52

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, MAR. 5, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

12

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 58

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, MAR. 12, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

19

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 103

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, MAR. 19, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

2

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 31

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 2, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

9

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 53

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 9, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

16

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 24

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 16, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

23

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 55

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 23, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

30

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 60

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 30, 1898.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis Manager.

BLANK PAGE

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1898, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55. I. Allegro con brio. II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger."
WAGNER.	PRELUDE AND ISOLDEN'S LIEBESTOD, from "Tristan and Isolde."
WAGNER.	INTRODUCTION TO ACT III. of "Lohengrin."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENC

Wednesday Evening, April 20, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

8

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 1898, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E-flat major, "Eroica," op. 55. I. Allegro con brio. II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger."
WAGNER.	PRELUDE AND ISOLDEN'S LIEBESTOD, from "Tristan and Isolde."
WAGNER.	INTRODUCTION TO ACT III. of "Lohengrin."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE to "Tannhäuser."

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, April 20, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

8

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, March 30, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

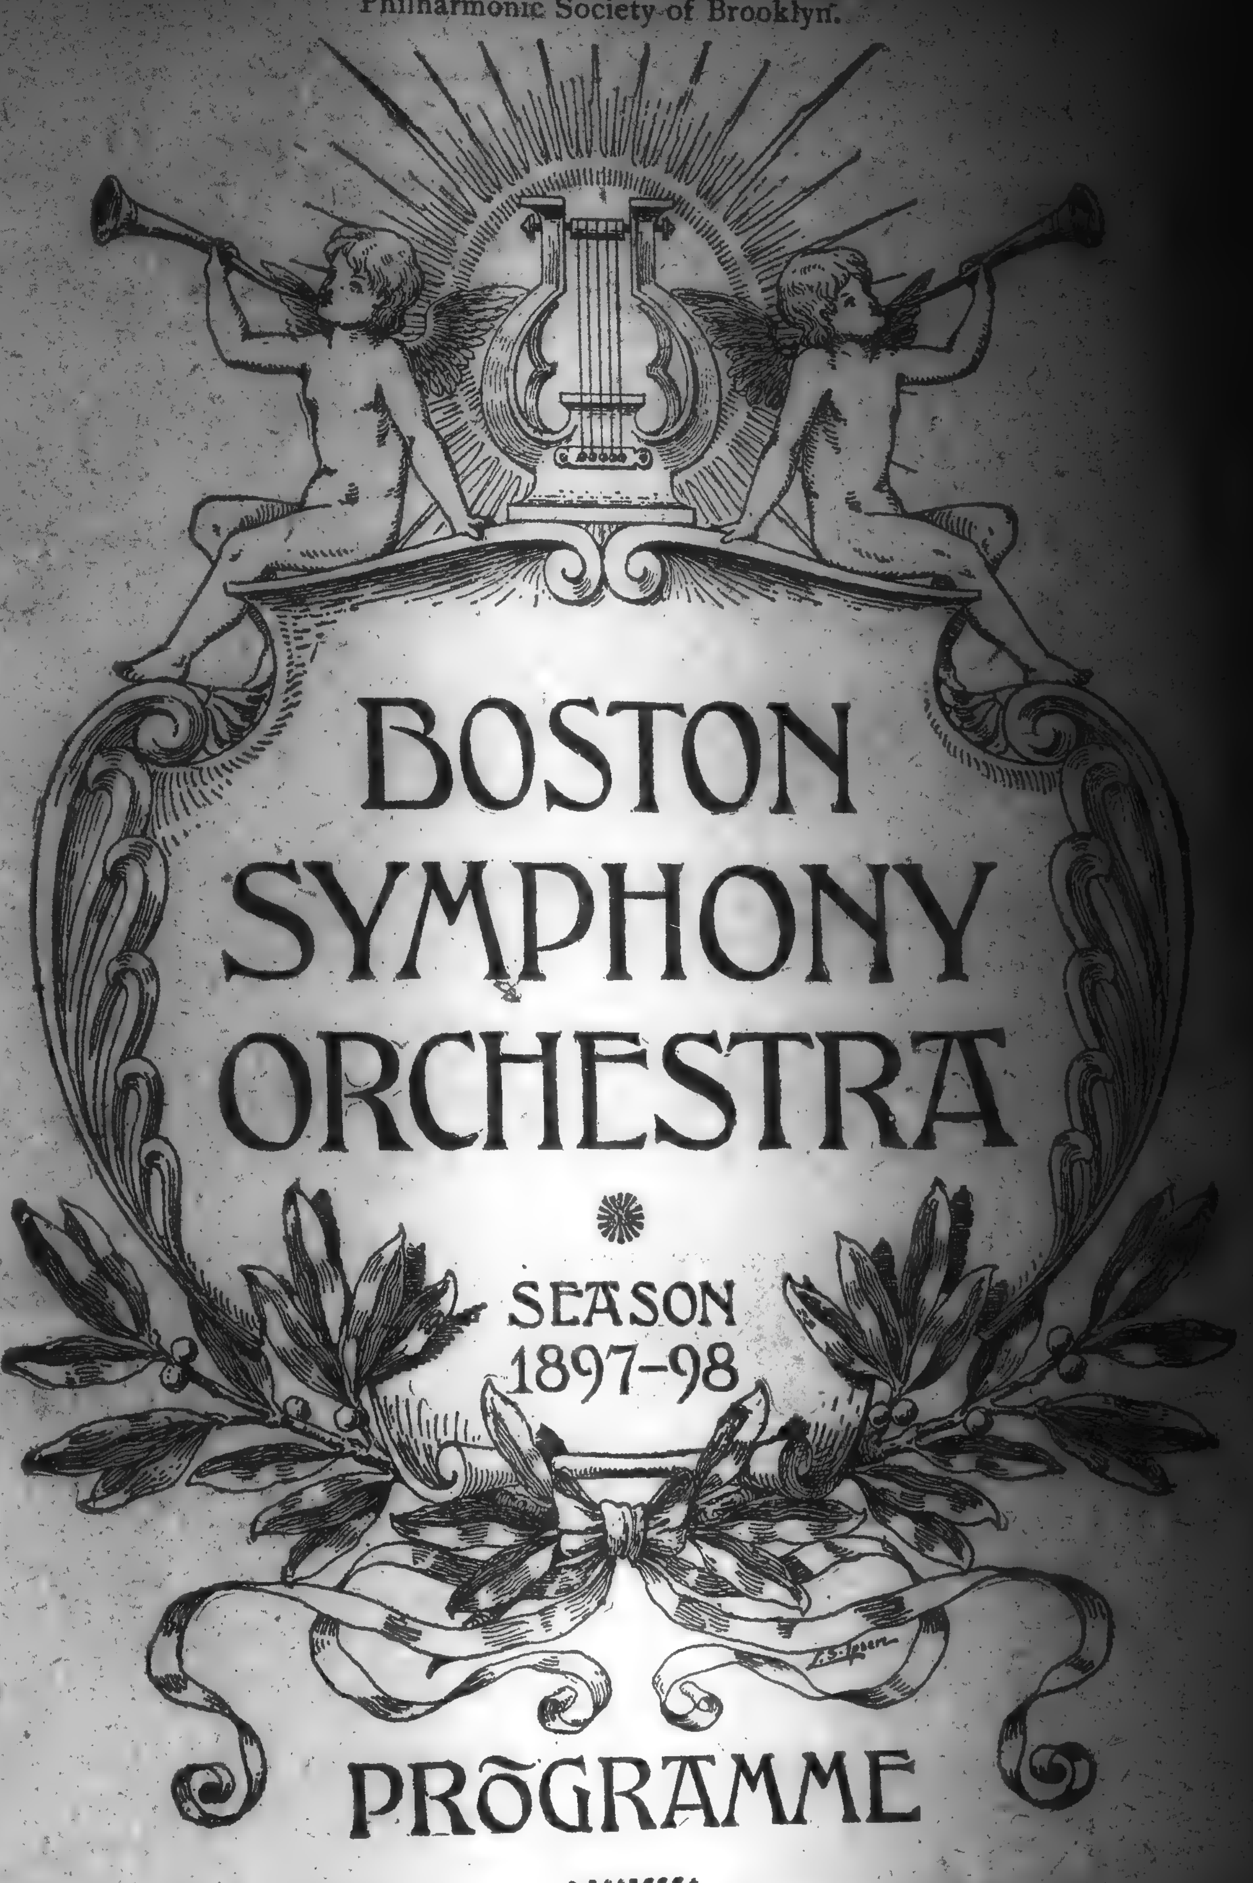
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

7

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . BRO

Friday Afternoon, March 25, at 3 precisely.
Saturday Evening, March 26, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

CONCERT.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1898, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
MOZART.	RECITATIVE, "Non Paventar," and ARIA, "Infelice," from "Il Flauto magico."
CHABRIER.	RHAPSODY for ORCHESTRA, "España."
FÉLICIEN DAVID.	COUPLETS DU MYSOLI, "Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Brésil."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser."

Soloist:

Mrs. MARIAN TITUS.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

C. M. LOEFFLER.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "La Mort de Tintagiles." (suggested by the Drama by MAURICE MAETERLINCK), for ORCHESTRA and two VIOLES D'AMOUR obbligate (MS.) (The VIOLES D'AMOUR by Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL and Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.)
SAINT-SAËNS.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 1, in B minor, op. 61. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Andantino quasi Allegretto. III. Molto moderato e maestoso. — Allegro non troppo.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso. — Allegro molto vivace. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. — Trio I.: Molto più vivace. — Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 28. The programme will include the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," and Wagner Selections.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, March 30, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

7

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . BROOKLY

Friday Afternoon, March 25, at 3 precisely.
Saturday Evening, March 26, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1897–98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

CONCERT.

TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1898, AT 8, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathetic," op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso.
MOZART.	RECITATIVE, "Non Paventar," and ARIA, "Infelice," from "Il Flauto magico."
CHABRIER.	RHAPSODY for ORCHESTRA, "España."
FÉLICIEN DAVID.	COUPLETS DU MYSOLI, "Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Brésil."
WAGNER.	OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser."

Soloist:

Mrs. MARIAN TITUS.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEA[illegible]

BOSTON SY[illegible]ESTRA,

Mr. E[illegible]

[illegible]

THURSDAY, [illegible] P. M

[illegible]

C. M. LOEFFLER.	SYM[illegible] [illegible] LINC[illegible] obblig[illegible] (The [illegible] M[illegible]
SAINT-SAENS.	CONCERTO [illegible] I. Alleg[illegible] II. And[illegible] III. Mo[illegible]
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY [illegible] I. Andante un [illegible] II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto [illegible] — Trio II. IV. Allegro animato [illegible]

Soloist:

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI

Tenth and last Concert, Thursday, April 28. The programme will include the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," and Wagner Selections.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lafayette Square Opera House, Washington.

Tuesday Afternoon, March 22, at 4.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Lafayette Square Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, March 21, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Metropolitan Opera House, . . . New York.

Thursday Evening, March 24, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at the Metropolitan Opera House.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, March 23, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

[118]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOVSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74. I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo. II. Allegro con grazia. III. Allegro molto vivace. IV. Finale : Adagio lamentoso.
SAINT-SAENS.	ARIA "O love, thy help," from "Samson and Dalila."
GRIEG.	SUITE No. 1, from Music to "Peer Gynt," op. 46. II. AASE'S TOD: Andante doloroso. III. ANITRA'S TANZ: Tempo di Mazurka. IV. IN DER HALLE DES BERGKÖNIGS: Alla marcia e molto marcato.
	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) R. FRANZ.	"IM HERBST."
b) SCHUMANN.	"FRÜHLINGSNACHT."
MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE to "Ruy Blas."

Soloist :

Miss JOSEPHINE JACOBY.

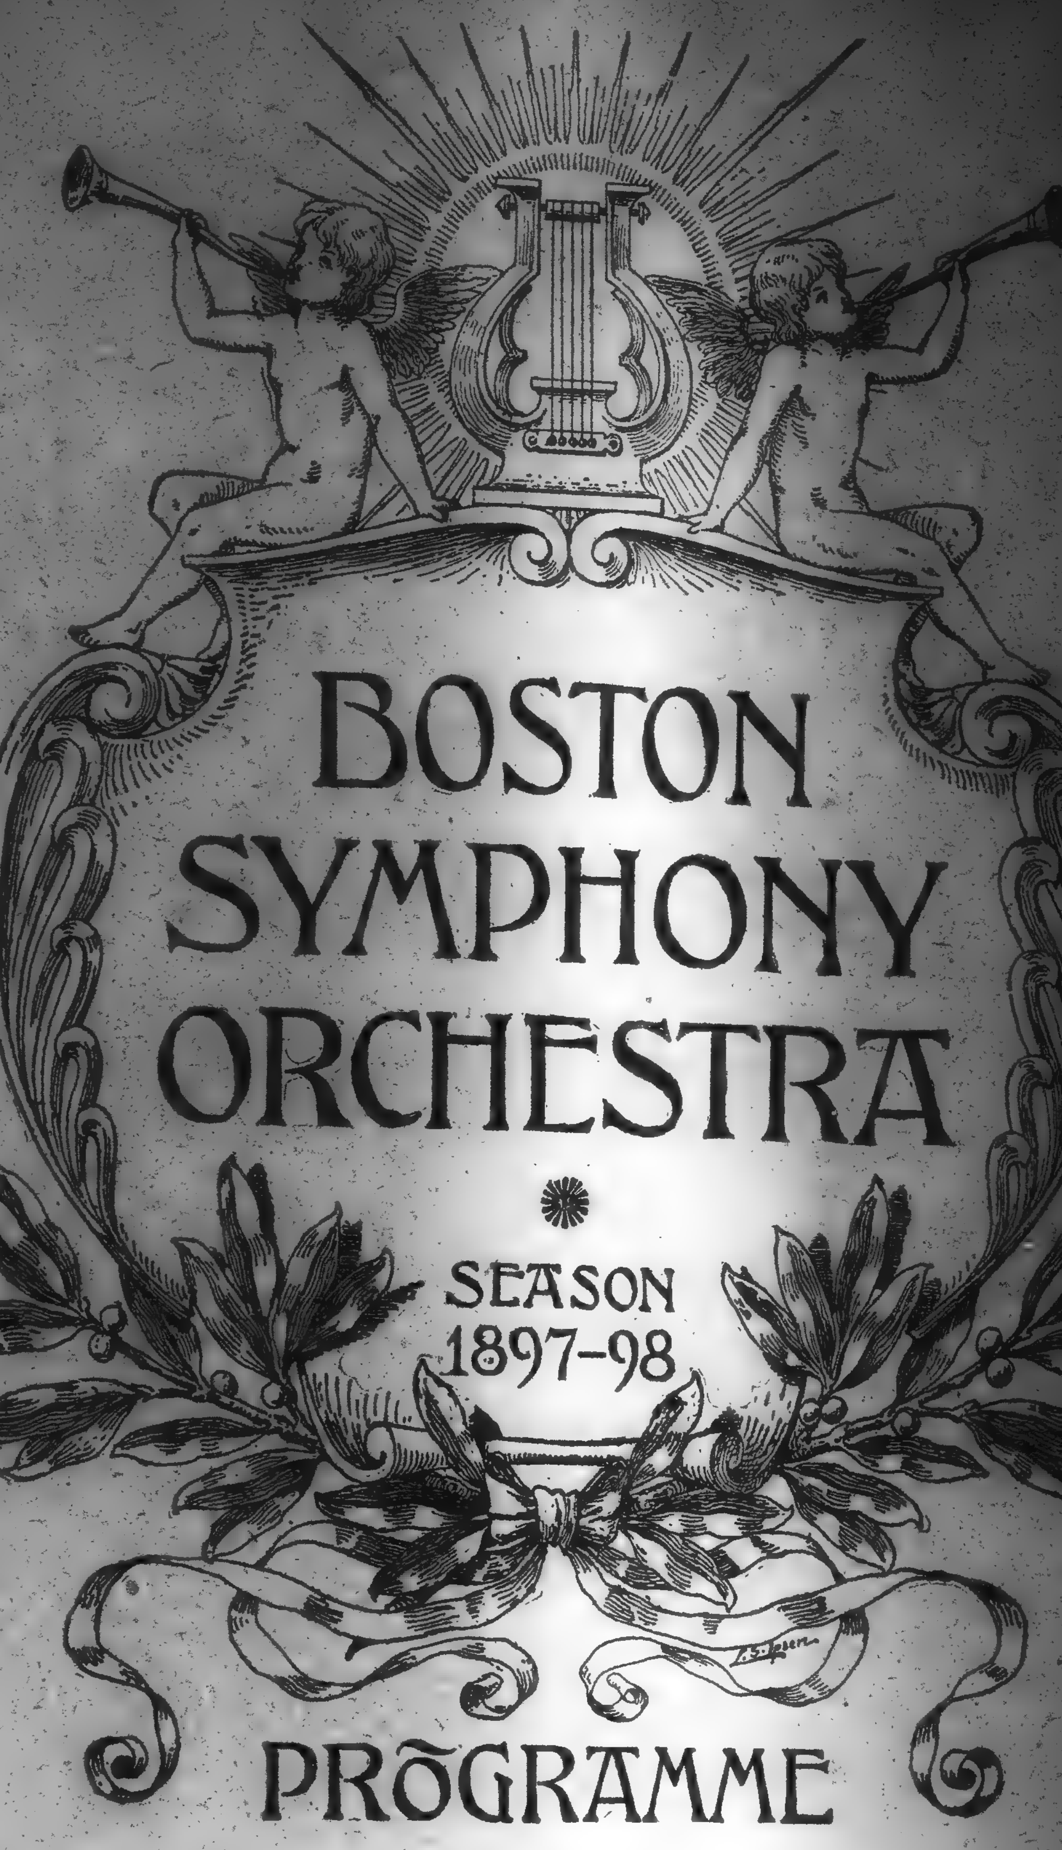
The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 17 The Orchestral Selections will include the "Spring Symphony," by J. K. Paine, the Symphonic Poem "Francesca da Rimini," by Tschaikovsky, and the Overtune to "Le Domino Noir," by Auber. The Soloist will be Mr. Ffrangcon Davies.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDE

Wednesday Evening, March 9, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	THREE MOVEMENTS from SYMPHONY No. 9, in D minor, op. 125. I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso. II. Molto vivace. — Presto. III. Adagio molto e cantabile.
BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
ARTHUR SULLIVAN.	TEMPLAR'S SOLILOQUY, from "Ivanhoe."
TSCHAIKOVSKY.	FANTASIA, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 32.
EDW. GERMAN.	THREE SPRING SONGS, with PIANOFORTE. a) "All the world awakes today." b) "The dew upon the lily." c) "My song is of the sturdy north."
AUBER.	OVERTURE to "The Black Domino."

Soloist :

Mr. FFRANGCON DAVIES.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 7. The Orchestral Selections will include the Symphonic Poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by C. M. Loeffler, and the Schumann Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major. The soloist, Mr. Alexander Siloti, will play the "Wanderer Fantasie" of Schubert, and the "Danse Macabre" of Liszt.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 10, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SMETANA.	OVERTURE to "The Sold Bride."
C. M. LOEFFLER.	DIVERTIMENTO for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA, in A minor, op. 9. I. Preambule: Allegro. II. Eglogue: Andante. III. Carnaval des Morts: Variations on the Theme "Dies Irae." Moderato. (First time at these Concerts.)
CHABRIER.	PRELUDE to Act II. of "Gwendoline."
RAFF.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, "Im Walde." op. 153. PART I. IN THE DAYTIME. Impressions and sensations: Allegro. PART II. AT TWILIGHT. a) Revery: Largo. b) Dance of Dryads: Allegro assai.—Poco meno mosso. PART III. AT NIGHT Silent rustling of the woods at night. Entrance and exit of the Wild Hunt, with FRAU HOLLE (Hulda) and WOTAN. Daybreak: Allegro.

Soloist :

Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Seventh Concert, Thursday, February 24. The Orchestral Selections will include the Tschaikowsky Symphony, No. 6, (Pathetic), the Grieg Suite, "Peer Gynt," and Mendelssohn Overture to "Ruy Blas." The Soloist will be Mme. Szumowska.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 24, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

TSCHAIKOVSKY. SYMPHONY No. 6, in B minor, "Pathétique," op. 74.
- I. Adagio. — Allegro non troppo.
- II. Allegro con grazia
- III. Allegro molto vivace.
- IV. Finale: Adagio lamentoso

SAINT-SAENS. ARIA "O love, thy help," from "Samson and Dalila."

GRIEG. SUITE No. 1, from Music to "Peer Gynt," op. 46.
- II. Aase's Tod: Andante doloroso
- III. Anitra's Tanz: Tempo di Mazurka.
- IV. In der Halle des Bergkönigs: Alla marcia e molto marcato.

SONGS with Pianoforte.

a) R. FRANZ. "Im Herbst."

b) SCHUMANN. "Frühlingsnacht."

MENDELSSOHN. OVERTURE to "Ruy Blas."

Soloist:

Miss JOSEPHINE JACOBY.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 17. The Orchestral Selections will include the "Spring Symphony," by J. K. Paine, the Symphonic Poem "Francesca da Rimini" by Tschaikovsky, and the Overture to "Le Domino Noir," by Auber. The Soloist will be Mr. Ffrangcon Davies.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, March 9, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1897-98
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. THREE MOVEMENTS from SYMPHONY No. 9, in D minor, op. 125.
- I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
- II. Molto vivace. — Presto.
- III. Adagio molto e cantabile.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.

ARTHUR SULLIVAN. TEMPLAR'S SOLILOQUY, from "Ivanhoe."

TSCHAIKOVSKY. FANTASIA, "Francesca da Rimini," op. 32.

EDW. GERMAN. THREE SPRING SONGS, with Pianoforte.
- a) "All the world awakes today."
- b) "The dew upon the lily."
- c) "My song is of the sturdy north."

AUBER. OVERTURE to "The Black Domino."

Soloist:

Mr. FFRANGCON DAVIES.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Ninth Concert, Thursday, April 7. The Orchestral Selections will include the Symphonic Poem, "The Death of Tintagiles," by C. M. Loeffler, and the Schumann Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major. The soloist, Mr. Alexander Siloti, will play the "Wanderer Fantasie" of Schubert, and the "Danse Macabre" of Liszt.

Sanders The[illegible]ridge.

[illegible]

B[illegible]RA,

Mr. [illegible]

THURSDAY [illegible] P. M.

SMETANA [illegible]

C. M. LOEFFLER [illegible]ESTRA, in A [illegible] Dies [illegible]

CHABRIER [illegible]

RAFF. SYMPHONY [illegible] "Im Walde," op. 153.
- Part I. [illegible] Allegro.
- Part II. At Twilight [illegible] assai. — Poco [illegible]
- Part III. At Night [illegible]ght. En- [illegible] Holle [illegible]

Soloist:

Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

Seventh Concert, Thursday, February 24. The Orchestral Selections will include the Tschaikowsky Symphony, No. 6, (Pathetic), the Grieg Suite, "Peer Gynt," and Mendelssohn Overture to "Ruy Blas." The Soloist will be Mme. Szumowska.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Metropolitan Opera House, . . . New York.

Thursday Evening, February 17, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 4 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at the Metropolitan Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . BROOKLY

Friday Afternoon, February 18, at 3 precisely.
Saturday Evening, February 19, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.
I. Ziemlich langsam. — Lebhaft.
II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam.
III. Scherzo: Lebhaft. — Trio.
IV. Langsam. — Lebhaft.

MASSÉ. AIR, "Tristes Amour, from Galatée."

MASSENET. INCIDENTAL MUSIC to LECONTE DE LISLE'S "Les Erinnyes."
I. Entr'acte: Andante.
II Danse grecque; Allegro moderato.
III. Scène religieuse: Andantino, avec calme et simplicité.
IV. Invocation: Très lent et avec un grand sentiment.
V. Allegro très décidé.
(First time.)

FOOTE. QUATRAINS from the "Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám."
(MS.)

WEBER. OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Miss ANNA MILLER WOOD.

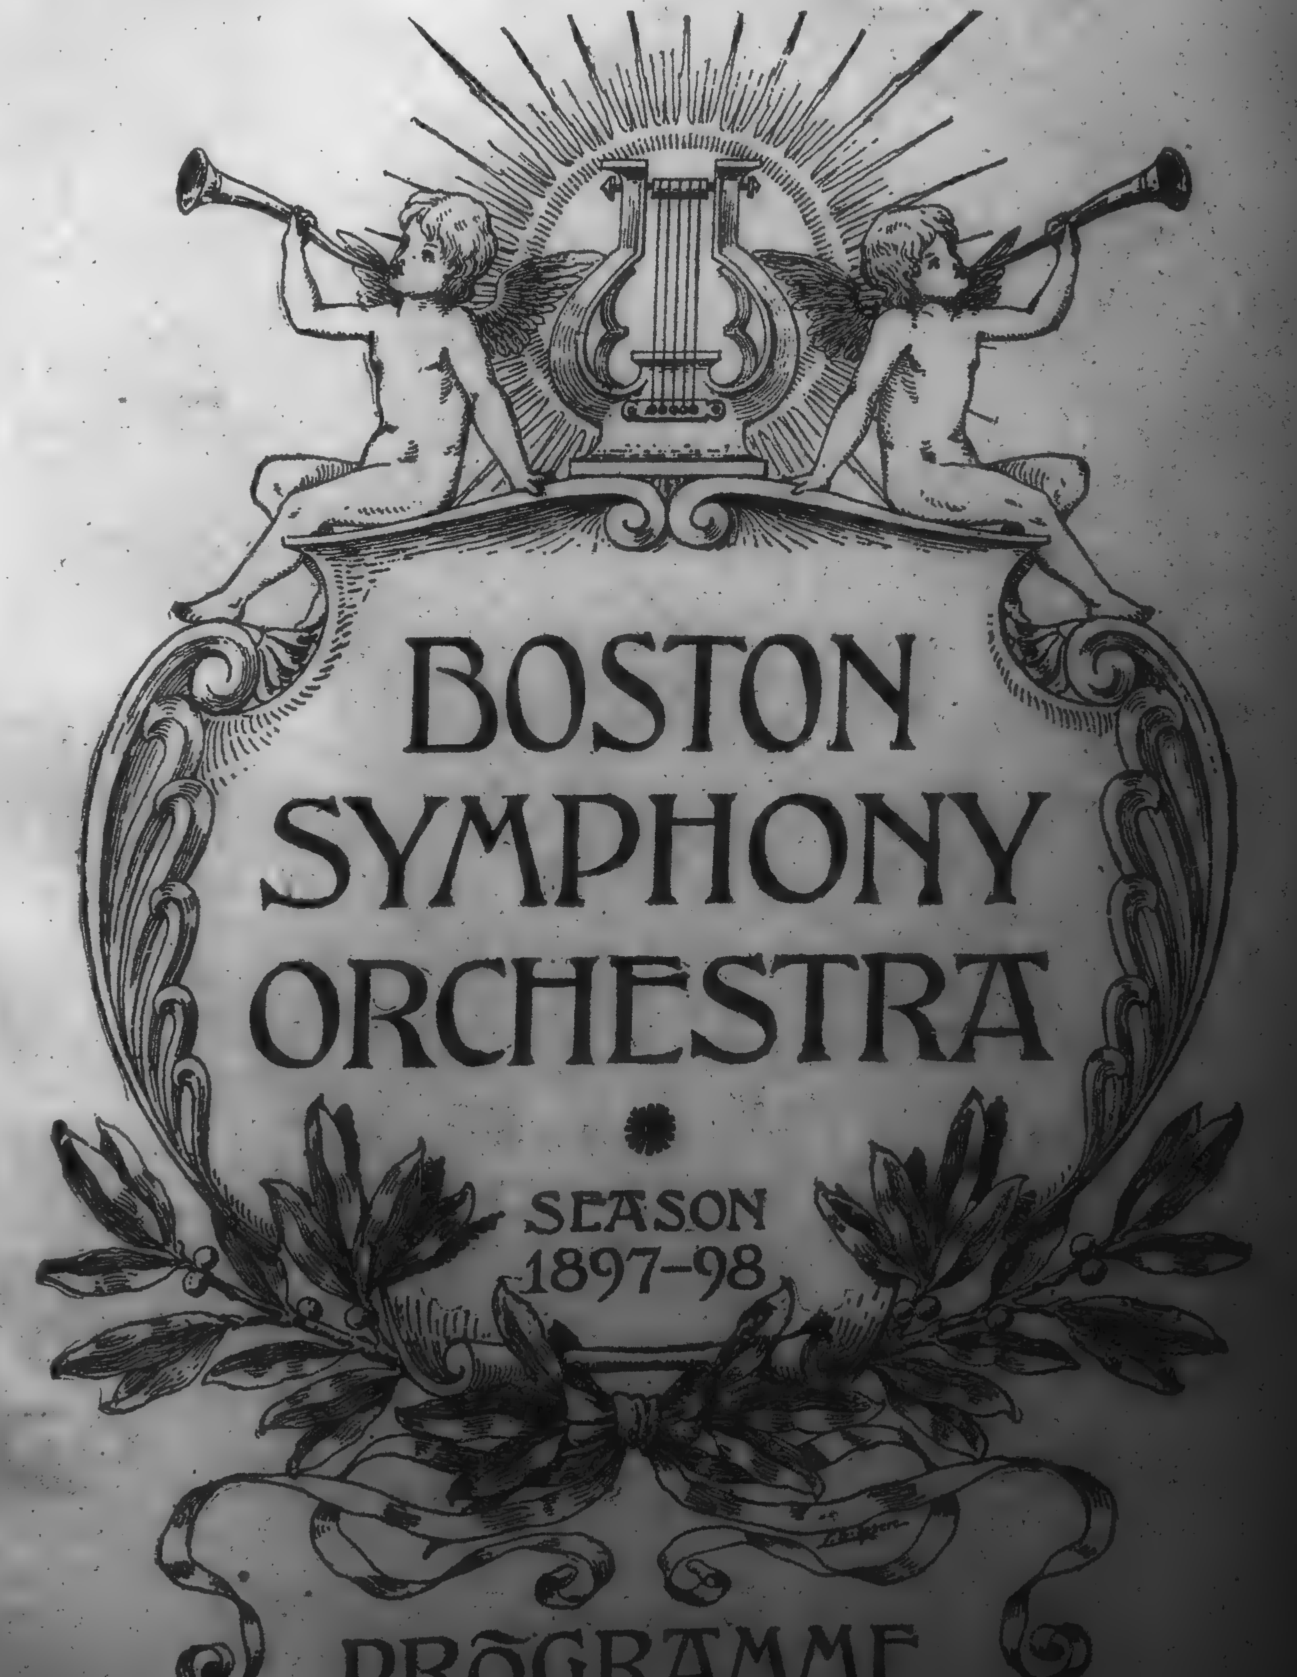
The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Sixth Concert, Thursday, February 10. The Orchestral Selections will include the Overture to the "Sold Bride," by Smetana, and the Raff Symphony, "In the Woods." The Soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play Two Movements from the Concerto for Violin by Goldmark.

8/1

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 14, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Metropolitan Opera House, . . . New York.

Thursday Evening, February 17, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 4 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at the Metropolitan Opera House.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 27, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY in D minor, No. 4, op. 120. I. Ziemlich langsam. — Lebhaft. II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam. III. Scherzo: Lebhaft. — Trio. IV. Langsam. — Lebhaft.
MASSÉ.	AIR, "Tristes Amour, from Galatée."
MASSENET.	INCIDENTAL MUSIC to LECONTE DE LISLE'S "Les Erinnyes." I. Entr'acte: Andante. II Danse grecque: Allegro moderato. III. Scène religieuse: Andantino, avec calme et simplicité IV. Invocation: Très lent et avec un grand sentiment. V. Allegro très décidé. (First time.)
FOOTE.	QUATRAINS from the "Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám." (MS.)
WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."

Soloist:

Miss ANNA MILLER WOOD.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Sixth Concert, Thursday, February 10. The Orchestral Selections will include the Overture to the "Sold Bride," by Smetana, and the Raff Symphony, "In the Woods." The Soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel, who will play Two Movements from the Concerto for Violin by Goldmark.

8/1

[120]

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, February 18, at 3 precisely.
Saturday Evening, February 19, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 14, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

PASTE OVER

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.	OVERTURE, "Magic Flute."
BACH.	SINFONIA (Shepherd's Music), from the "Christmas Oratorio."
PIETRO LOCATELLI, 1693-1764.	SONATA for VIOLONCELLO. a) Allegro. b) Adagio. c) Menuetto con variazioni.

[Piano accompaniment arranged by ALFREDO PIATTI.]

TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor, op. 64. I. Andante. — Allegro con anima. II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza. III. Valse: Allegro moderato. IV. Finale: Andante maestoso. — Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Fifth Concert, Thursday, January 27. The Orchestral Selections will include the Schumann Symphony in D minor, No. 4; a Suite "Les Erinnyés" (first time) by Massenet, and the Overture "Euryanthe" by Weber. The soloist will be Miss Anna Millar Wood.

PASTE OVER

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY No. 46, in D major (without Minuet). (Breitkopf & Härtel First Edition, No. 1.) I. Adagio. — Allegro. II. Andante. III. Finale: Presto.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 58. I. Allegro moderato. II. Andante con moto. III. Rondo: Vivace.
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF.	SYMPHONIC SUITE, "Scheherazade," op. 35. I. The Sea and Sindbad's Ship: Largo maestoso. — Allegro non troppo. III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess: Andantino quasi allegretto. IV. Festival at Bagdad; the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship: Allegro molto e frenetico. — Vivo. — Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr. ALBERTO JONAS.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, January 6. The Orchestral Selections will include the Overture "Euryanthe" by Weber, the Suite "Les Erinnyés" by Massenet, and the Schumann Symphony in D minor, No. 4. The soloist will be Miss Wood.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lafayette Square Opera House, Washington.

Tuesday Afternoon, February 15, at 4.15.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Lafayette Square Opera House.

MUSIC HALL, BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, February 16, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

PASTE OVER

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.	OVERTURE, "Magic Flute."
BACH.	SINFONIA (Shepherd's Music), from the "Christmas Oratorio."
PIETRO LOCATELLI. 1693-1764	SONATA for VIOLONCELLO a) [illegible] b) [illegible] c) [illegible] con variazioni. Pianoforte accompaniment arranged by [illegible]
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in E minor, op. 64. I. [illegible] con anima. II. [illegible] III. Valse. [illegible] IV. Finale. [illegible] Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

The pianoforte is a Steinway.

Fifth Concert, Thursday, [illegible] The orchestral selections will include the Schumann Symphony in D minor, No. 4, [illegible] "Les Erinnyes" (first time) by Massenet, and the Overture "Euryanthe" by Weber. The soloist will be Miss Anna Millar Wood.

PASTE OVER

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 9, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY No. 46, in D major (without Minuet). (Breitkopf & Härtel First Edition, No. 1.) I. [illegible] II. Andante. III. Finale. [illegible]
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 58. I. [illegible] II. Andante [illegible] III. Rondo. [illegible]
RIMSKY-KORSAKOFF.	SYMPHONIC SUITE, "Scheherazade," op. 35. I. [illegible] Ship: Largo maestoso. — Allegro non troppo. III. The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess: Andantino quasi allegretto. IV. [illegible] the Sinking of Sindbad's Ship: [illegible] Vivo. — Allegro.

Soloist:

Mr. ALBERTO JONAS.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Fourth Concert, Thursday, [illegible] Selections will include the Overture "Euryanthe" by Weber, the [illegible] "Les Erinnyes" by Massenet, and the Schumann Symphony in D minor, No. 4. The soloist will be Miss Wood.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Lafayette Square Opera House, Washington.

Tuesday Afternoon, February 15, at 4.15.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Lafayette Square Opera House.

MUSIC HALL, BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, February 16, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, January 19, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1897-98
PROGRAMME

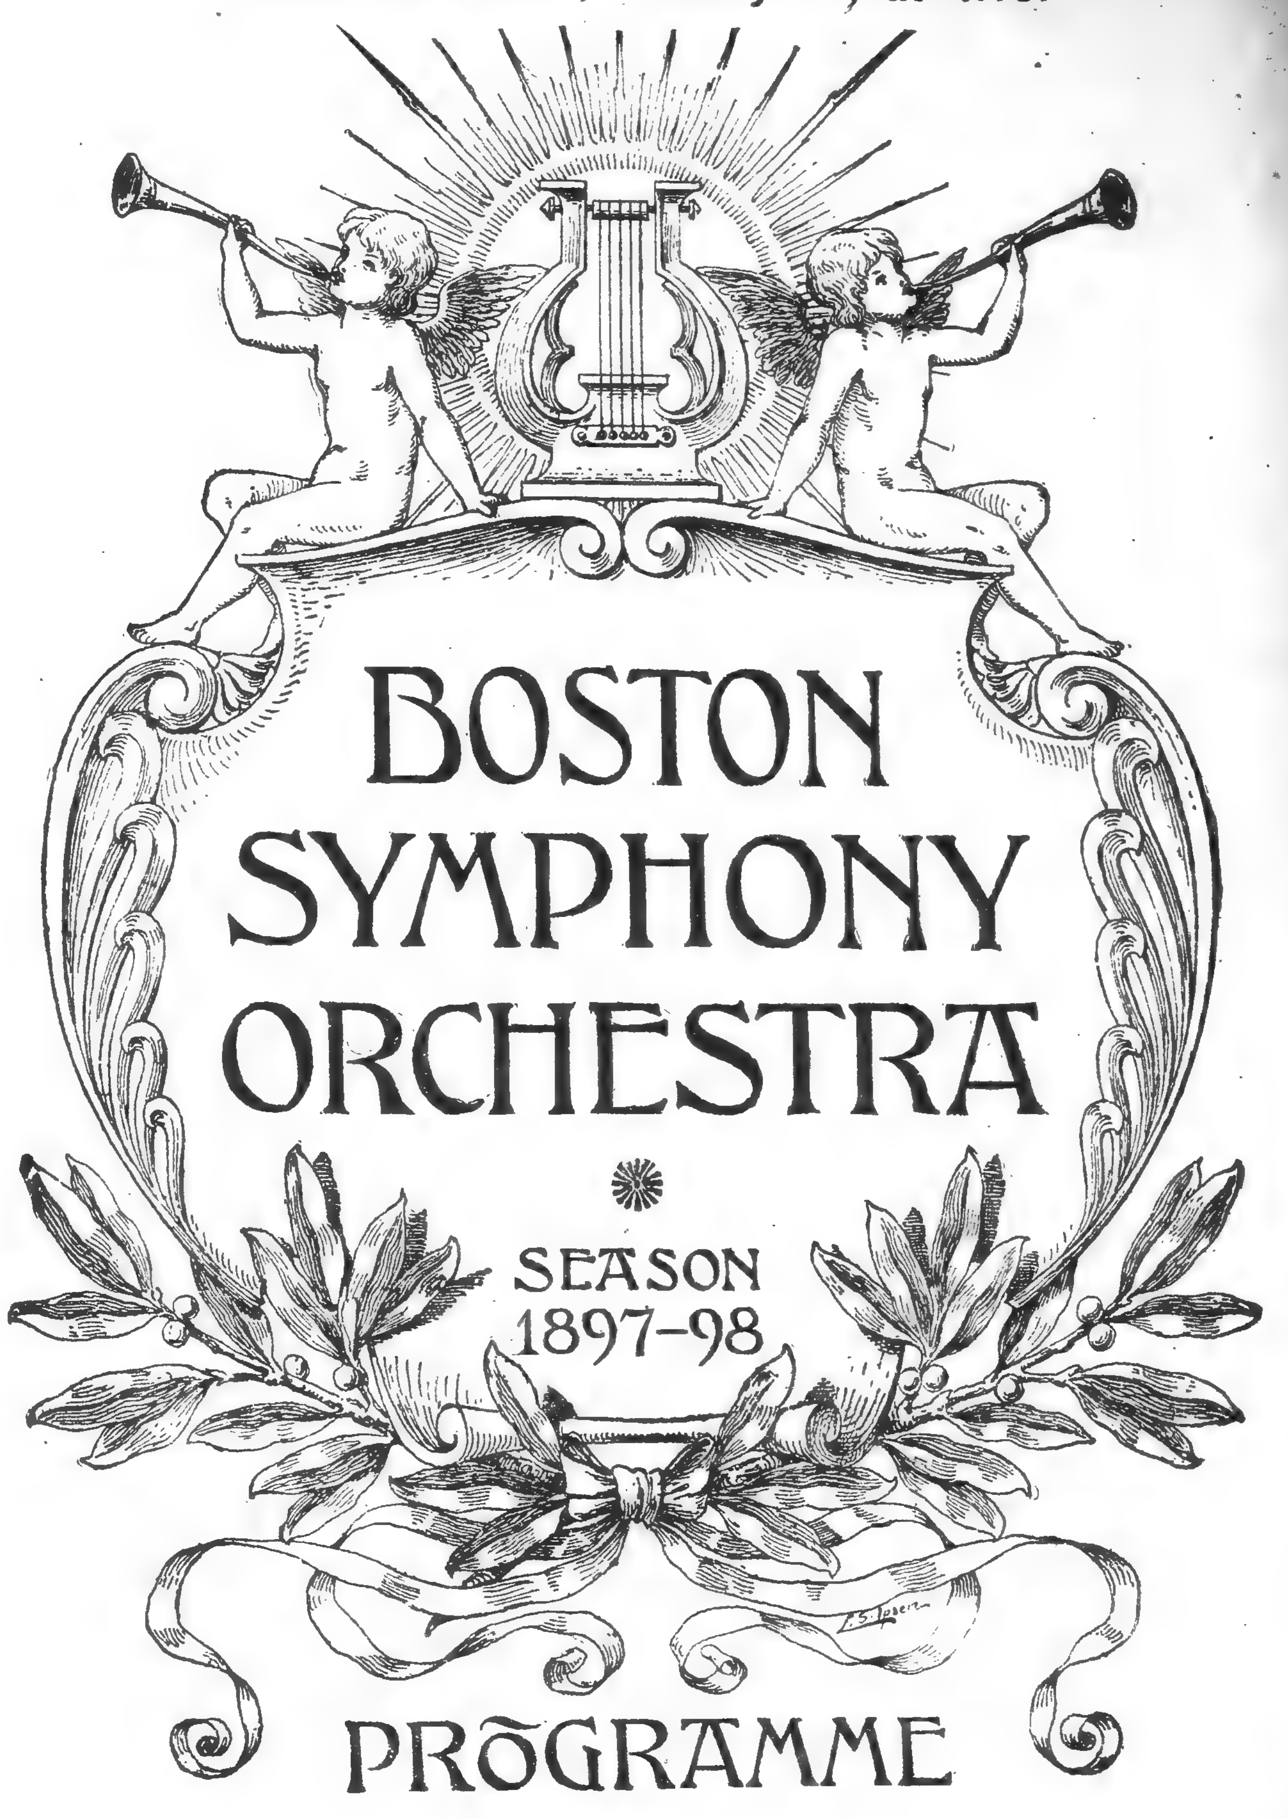
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

Lafayette Square Opera House, Washington.

Tuesday Afternoon, January 18, at 4.15.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1897-98
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Lafayette Square Opera House.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, January 21, at 3 precisely.

Saturday Evening, January 22, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1897-98
PROGRAMME

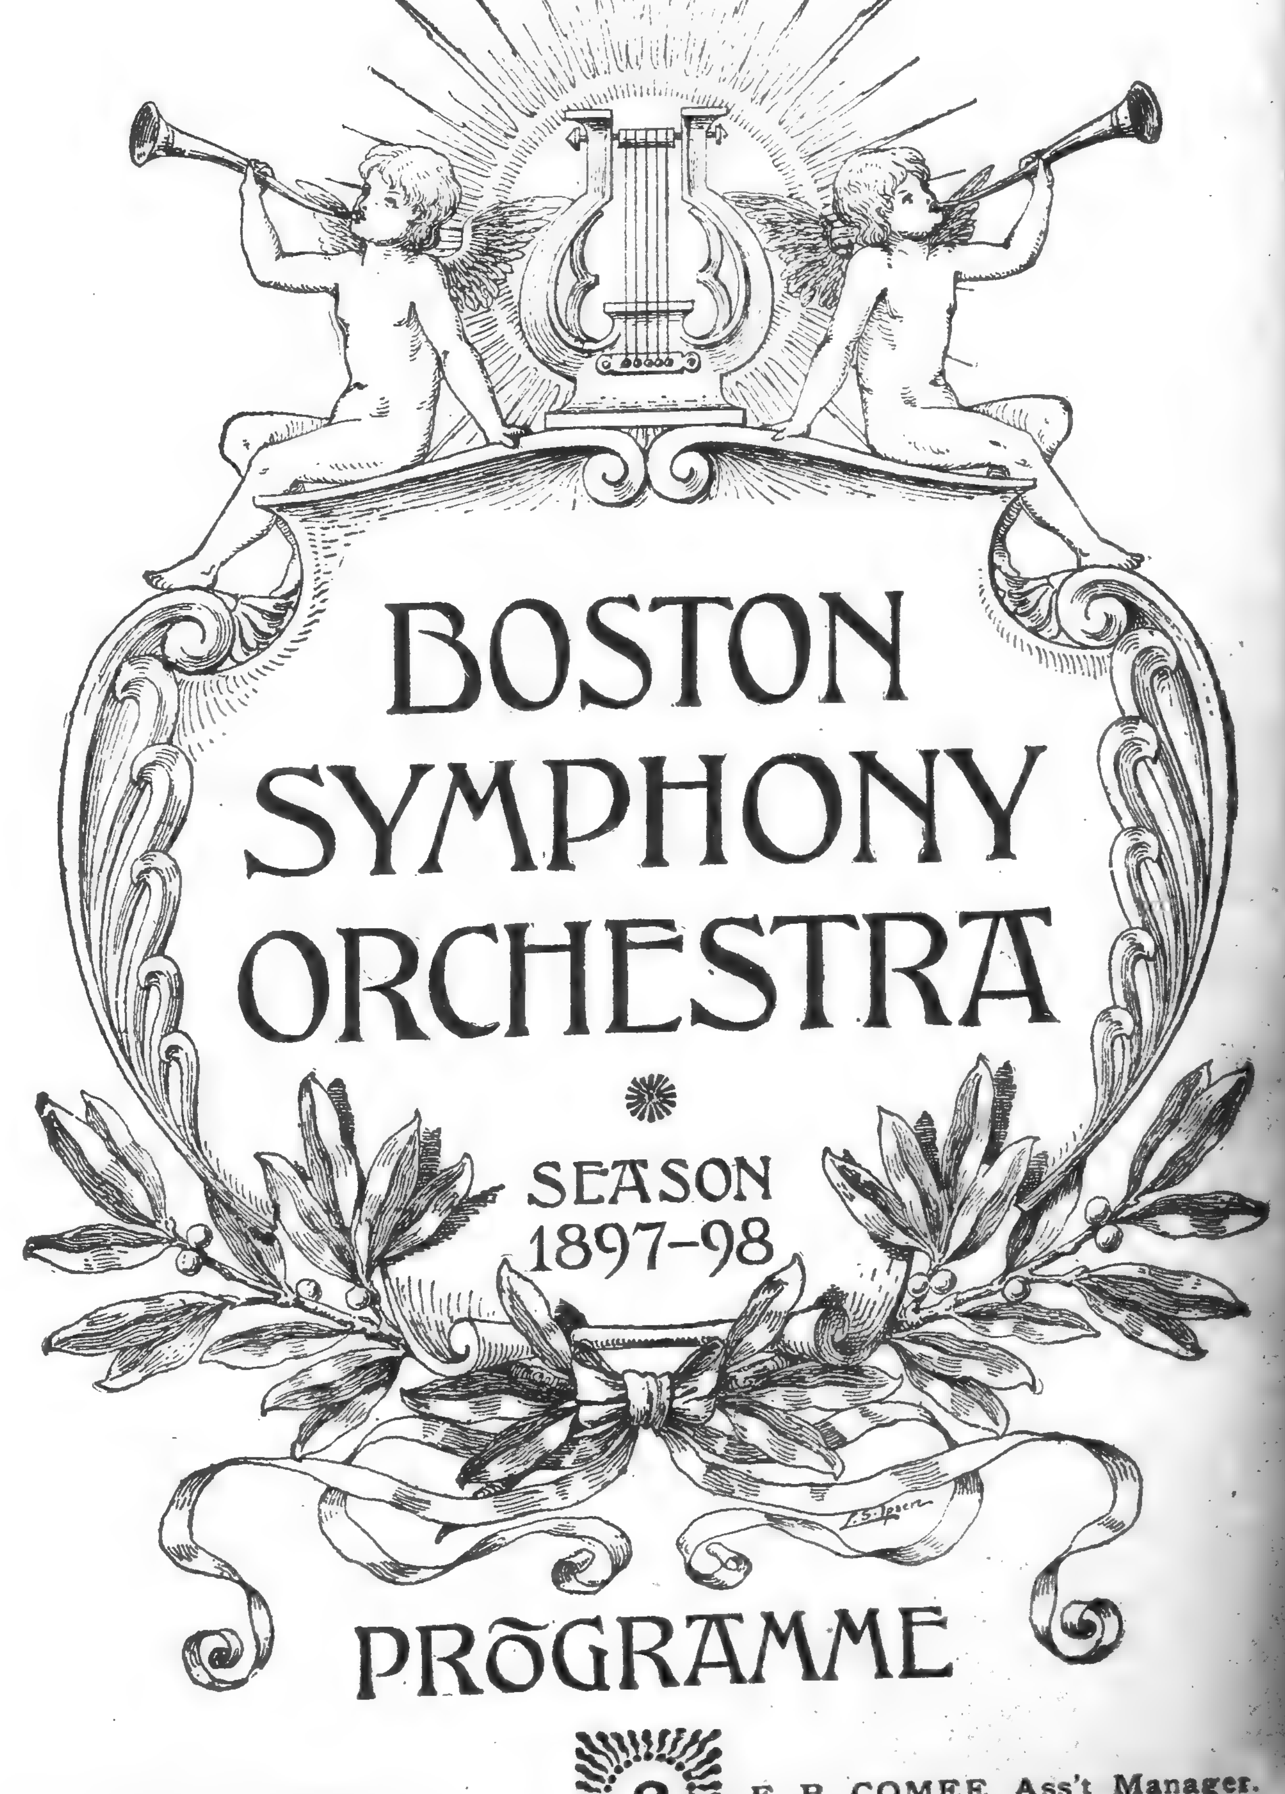
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

Metropolitan Opera House, ... New York.

Thursday Evening, January 20, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1897-98
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

3

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at the Metropolitan Opera House.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, January 12, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC . . . . BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, December 17, at 3 precisely.
Saturday Evening, December 18, at 8.15 precisely.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, January 17, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

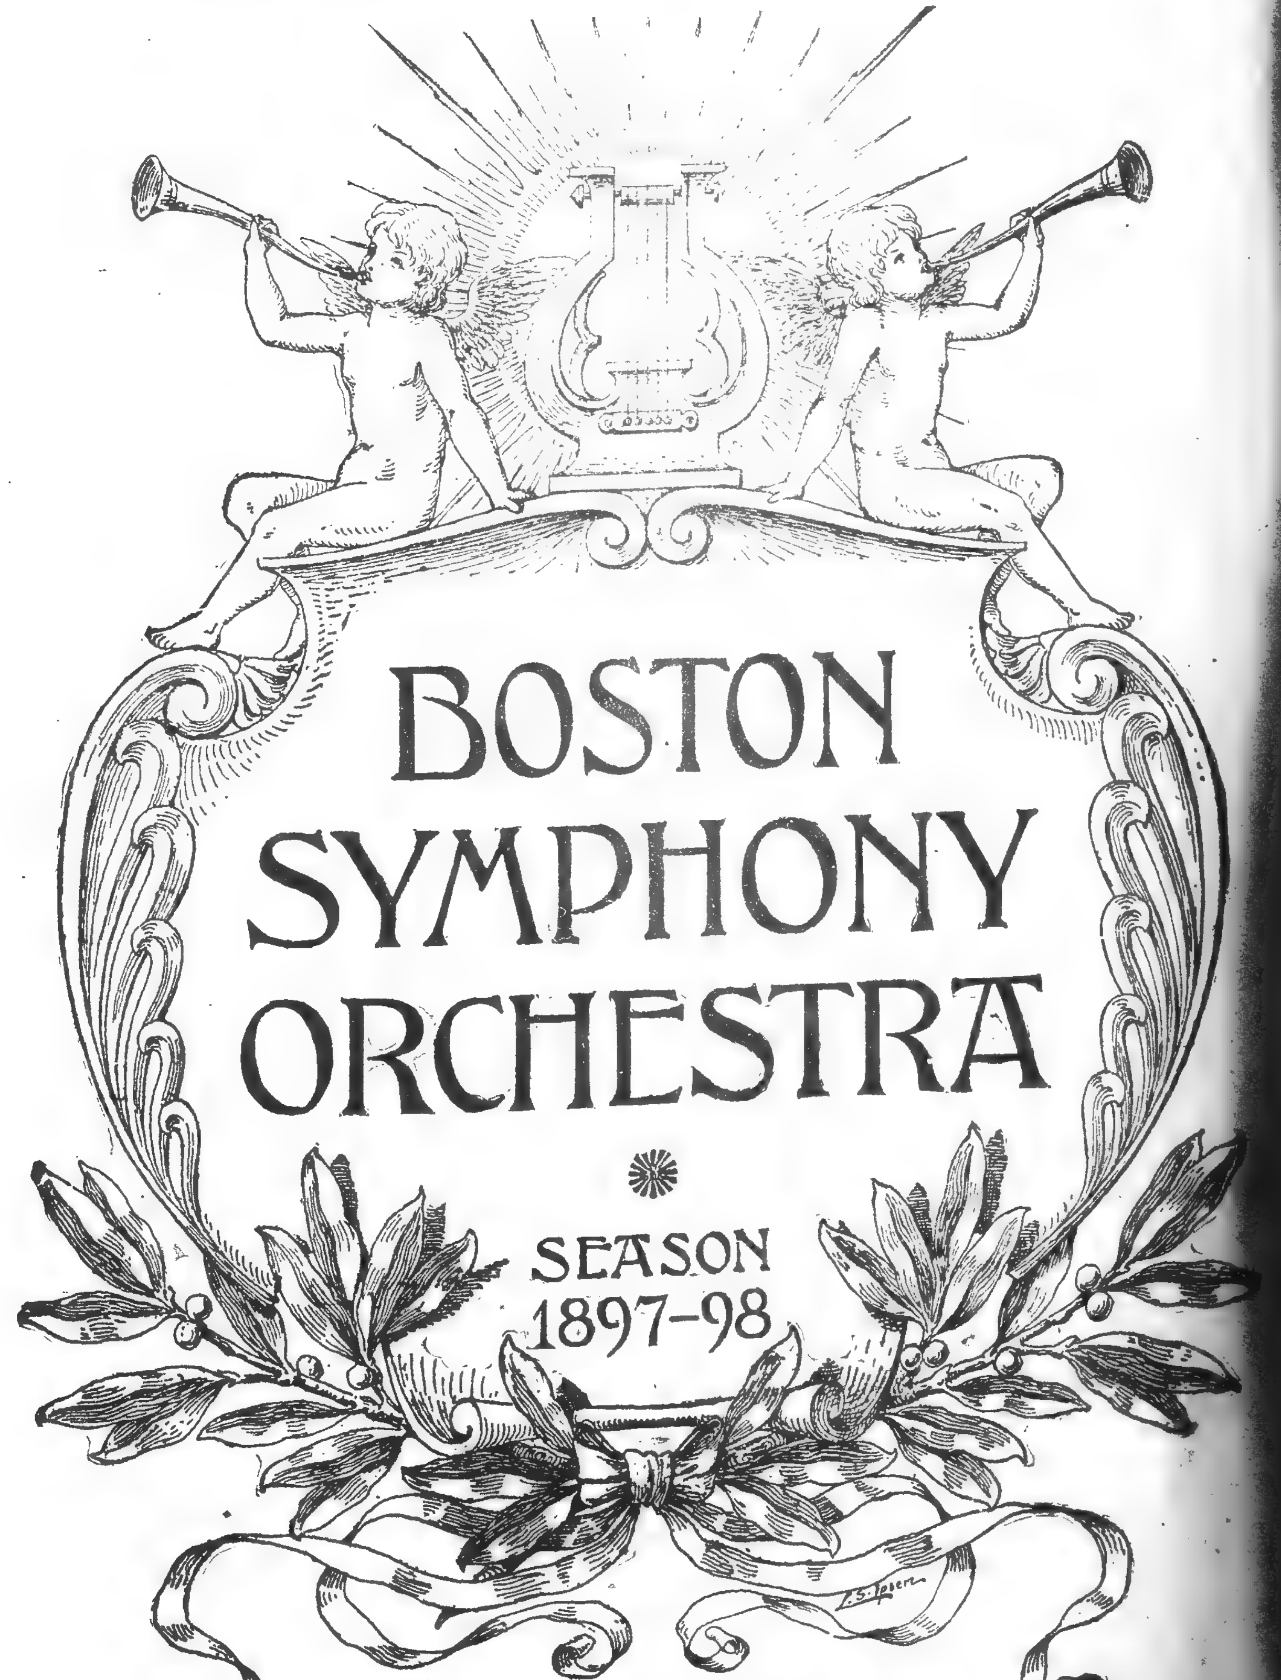
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1221 Chestnut St.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, February 2, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

[123]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, December 15, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC OVERTURE. op. 81.
MOZART.	RECITATIVE AND ARIA. "Non paventar," from "The Magic Flute."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92. I. Poco sostenuto.—Vivace. II. Allegretto. III. Presto.—Presto meno assai. IV. Allegro con brio.
FÉLICIEN DAVID.	COUPLETS DU MYSOLI, "Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Brésil."
CHABRIER.	RHAPSODY for ORCHESTRA, "España." (First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

Mrs. MARIAN TITUS.

Second Concert, Thursday, November 18. The Orchestral Selections will include a Haydn Symphony, the Andante and Scherzo from Symphony by Goetz, and the Italian Caprice by Tschaikowsky. Miss Gertrude May Stein, Contralto, will be the Soloist.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, December 29, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, December 15, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1897-98.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC OVERTURE. op. 81.
MOZART.	RECITATIVE AND ARIA. "Non paventar," from "The Magic Flute."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 7, in A major, op. 92. I. Poco sostenuto.—Vivace. II. Allegretto. III. Presto.—Presto meno assai. IV. Allegro con brio.
FÉLICIEN DAVID.	COUPLETS DU MYSOLI, "Charmant oiseau," from "La Perle du Brésil."
CHABRIER.	RHAPSODY for ORCHESTRA, "España" (First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

Mrs. MARIAN TITUS.

Second Concert, Thursday, November 18. The Orchestral Selections will include a Haydn Symphony, the Andante and Scherzo from Symphony by Goetz, and the Italian Caprice by Tschaikowsky. Miss Gertrude May Stein, Contralto, will be the Soloist.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, December 29, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.

Wednesday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897–98.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Thursday Evening, November 11.
Thursday Evening, December 16.
Thursday Evening, January 20.
Thursday Evening, February 17.
Thursday Evening, March 24.

At 8.15 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Madame MELBA.
Madame NORDICA.
Mr. JOSEFFY.
Mr. KNEISEL.
Mr. LOEFFLER.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and Boxes, $50, $40, and $30, according to location.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

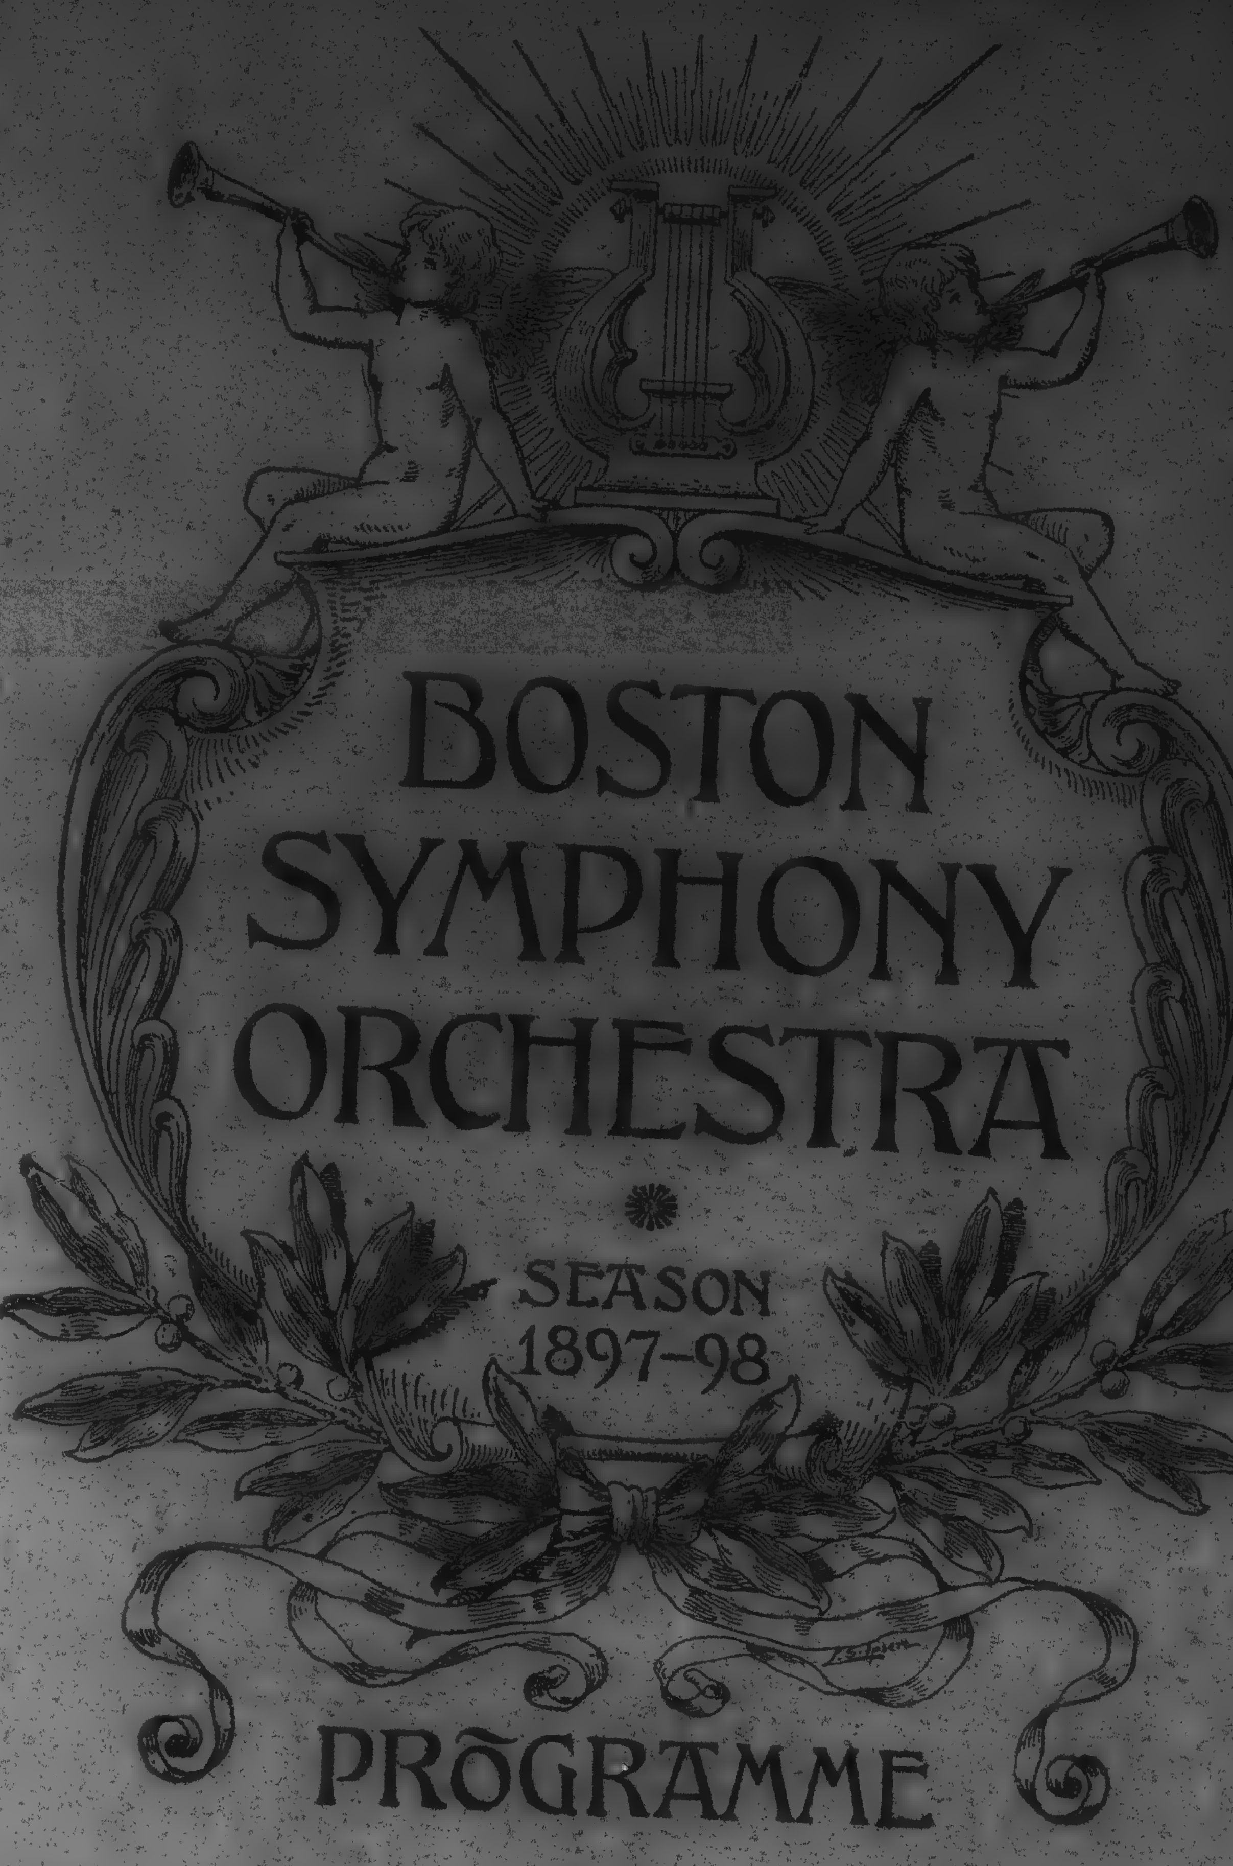
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, November 3, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

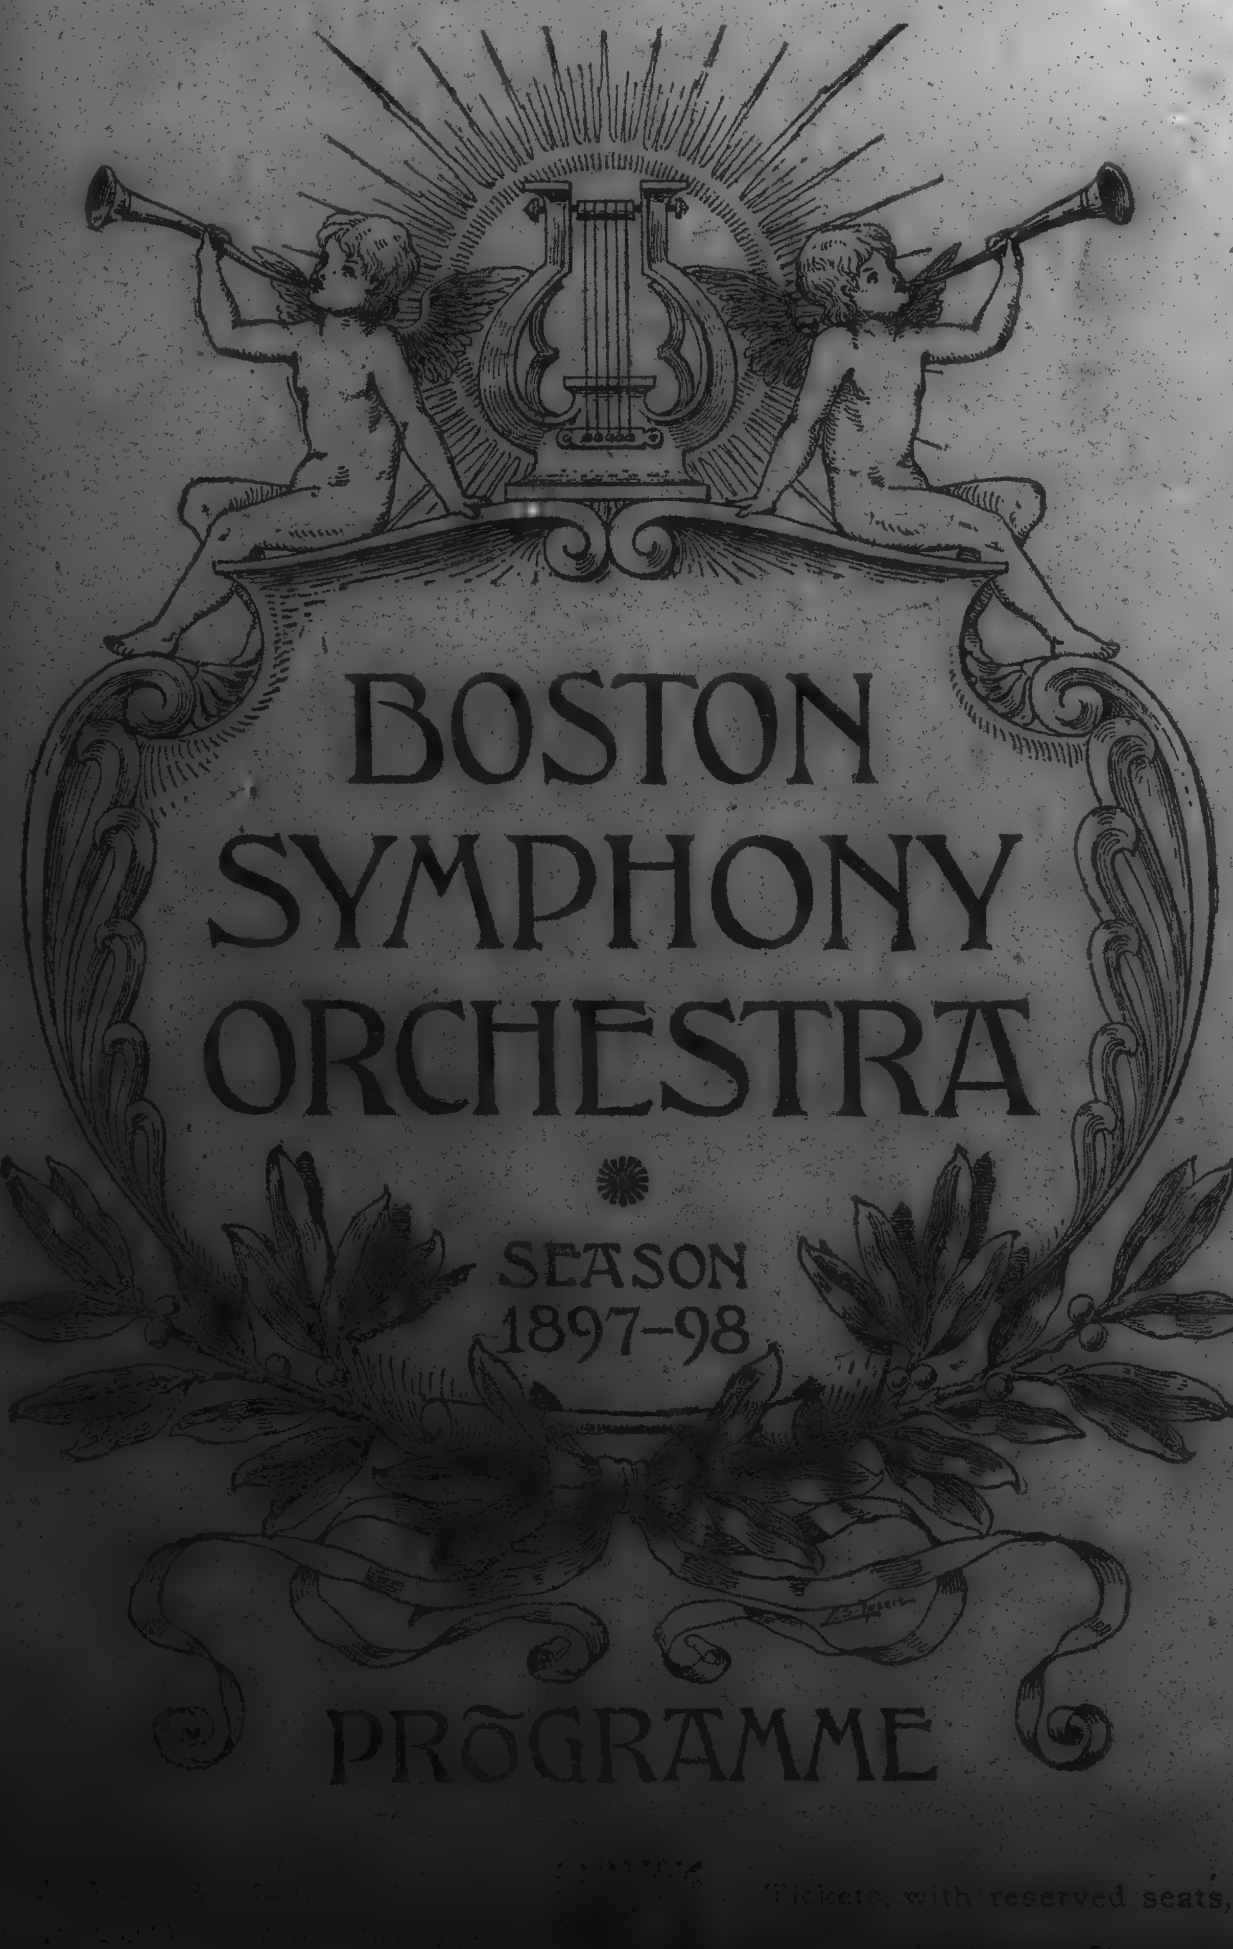
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight concerts, and single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, November 8, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897–98

PROGRAMME

Tickets, with reserved seats, on

MUSIC HALL, BALTIMORE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897–98.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Wednesday Evening, November 10.
Wednesday Evening, December 15.
Wednesday Evening, January 19.
Wednesday Evening, February 16.
Wednesday Evening, March 23.

At 8.15.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.
Mr. DAVID BISPHA
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.
Mr. C. M. LOEFFLE

And others, to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, cording to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season ticket

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 North Char Street, Monday morning, October 18, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distributi of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
C. A. ELLIS, Manag

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Thursday Evening, November 11.
Thursday Evening, December 16.
Thursday Evening, January 20.
Thursday Evening, February 17.
Thursday Evening, March 24.

At 8.15 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Madame MELBA.
Madame NORDICA.
Mr. JOSEFFY.
Mr. KNEISEL.
Mr. LOEFFLER.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and Boxes, $50, $40, and $30, according to location.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

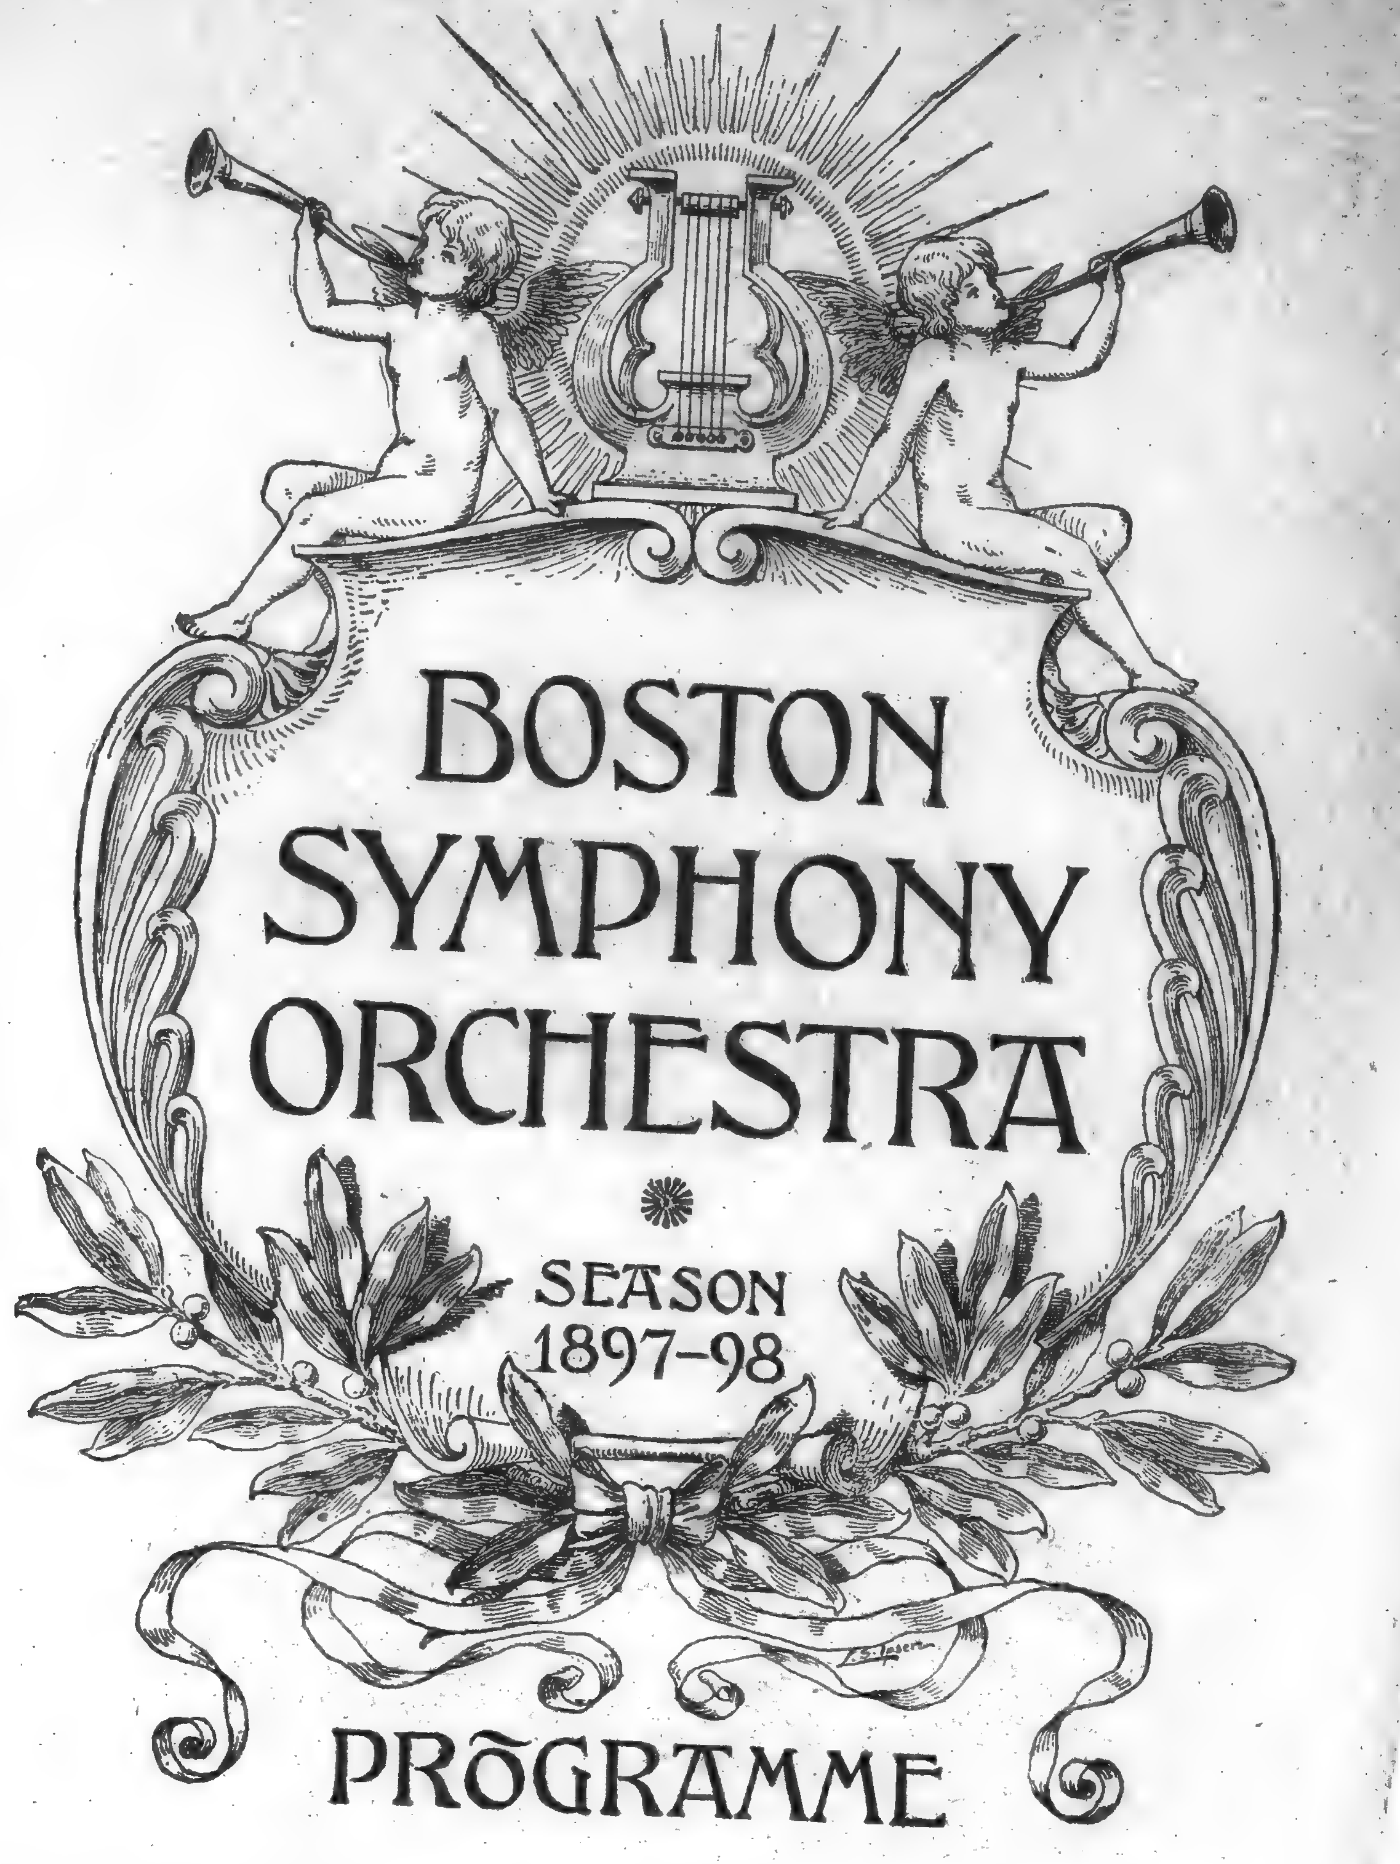
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, November 3, at 8 sharp.



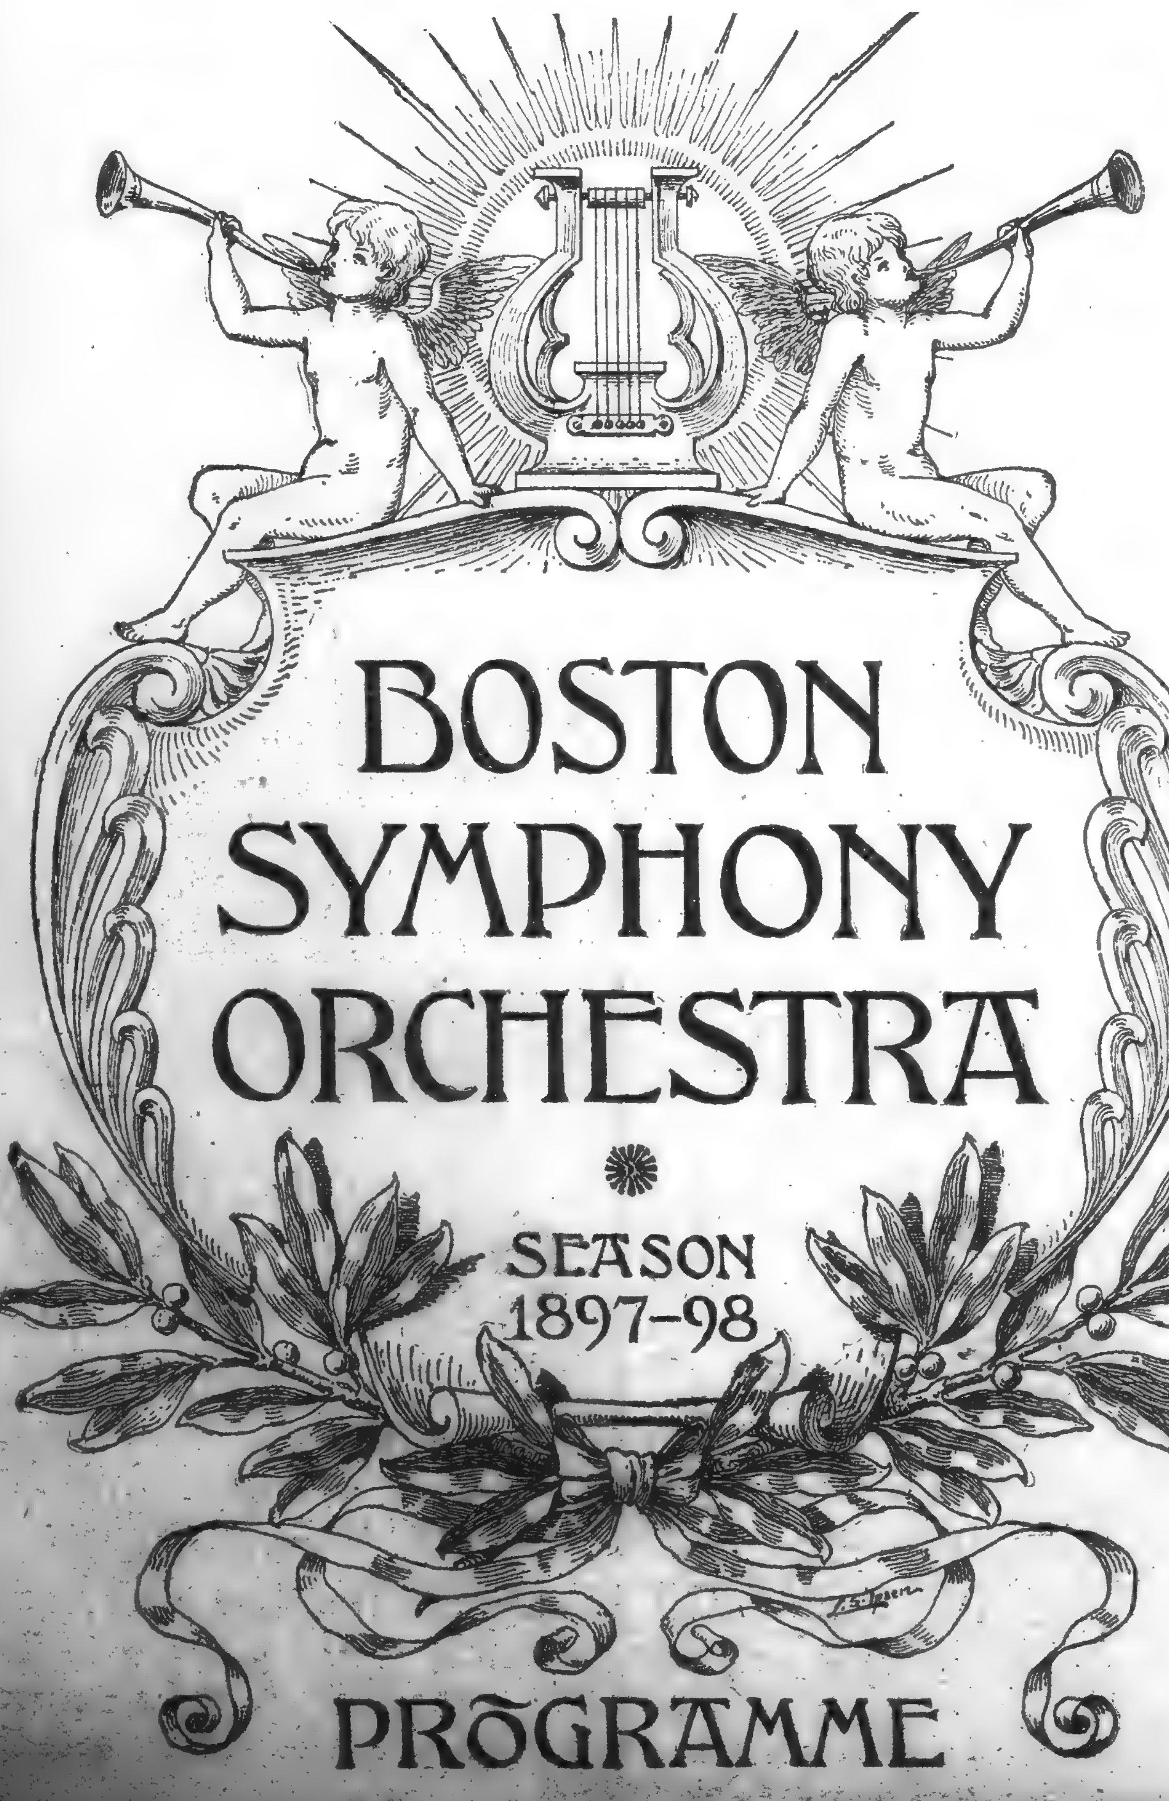
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight concerts, and single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, November 8, at 8.15 precisely.



C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Fischer's, 1121 Chestnut St.

MUSIC HALL, BALTIMORE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Wednesday Evening, November 10.
Wednesday Evening, December 15.
Wednesday Evening, January 19.
Wednesday Evening, February 16.
Wednesday Evening, March 23.

At 8.15.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.
Mr. DAVID BISPHAM.
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.
Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER.

And others, to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

The sale of season tickets will open at Albert's Ticket Office, 13 North Charles Street, Monday morning, October 18, at 9 o'clock. To secure a fair distribution of seats, no more than ten tickets will be sold to one person.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
C. A. ELLIS, Manage

"A virtuoso orchestra."— Sun.

"Peerless band of musicians."— Herald.

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."— Times.

"A fine virtuosity paired with equally fine musical feeling."— Tribune.

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."— World.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)
BEETHOVEN	Three movements from the Symphony No. 9
BRAHMS	Symphony No. 3, in F major
DVORAK	Symphony, "From the New World"
Mrs. H. H. A. BEACH	Symphony in E minor (Gaelic), Op. 32 (MS., first time.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Italian Caprice (First time.)
RIMSKY KORSAKOFF	Three movements from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" (First time.)
MASSENET	Suite, "Les Erinnyes" (First time.)
CHABRIER	Symphonic Poem, "Espagna" (First time.)
RICHARD STRAUSS	Symphonic Poem, "Also spracht Zarathustra" (First time.)
VOLKMANN	Serenade for String Orchestra, No. 3, in D minor Solo Violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.
WEBER-WEINGARTNER	"Invitation to Dance"
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Lenore, No. 3"
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"
BRAHMS	Academic Overture
WAGNER	Selections

INFANTRY HALL,

Wednesday Even

BO
SYM
ORCH
S
18
PROG

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHI

Monday Evening, November 8, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1897-98
PROGRAMME

MUSIC

The Sympho

Mr. EM

SEVENTE

FIVE

Wednesday Evening, No

Wednesday Evening, Jan

Wednesday Evening, Ma

SO

Mme. LILLIAN BLAUVELT
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.
And oth

Season tickets, with reserved
cording to location. Programme performed, will be mailed in advan
The sale of season tickets wil
Street, Monday morning, Octob of seats, no more than ten tickets

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manage

METROPOLITAN OPERA HOUSE.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS.

Mr. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR
CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

SEVENTEENTH SEASON, 1897-98.

FIVE CONCERTS.

Thursday Evening, November 11.
Thursday Evening, December 16.
Thursday Evening, January 20.
Thursday Evening, February 17.
Thursday Evening, March 24.

At 8.15 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS.

Madame MELBA.
Madame NORDICA.
Mr. JOSEFFY.
Mr. KNEISEL.
Mr. LOEFFLER.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and Boxes, $50, $40, and $30, according to location.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, November 3, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1897-98

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight concerts, and single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

"To say that the orchestra played as it usually does is equivalent to saying that its work was perfection."—Baltimore Sun.

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

"The same matchless organization which has charmed our people for years."—Baltimore American.

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

"Of the orchestral work, nothing but good words can be said."—Baltimore Herald.

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."—New York Times.

"Never surpassed by any similar organization."—Baltimore News.

"A fine virtuosity paired with equally fine musical feeling."—New York Tribune.

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."—New York World.

LIST OF WORKS TO BE PERFORMED.

BEETHOVEN	Symphony No. 3 (Eroica)
BEETHOVEN	Three movements from the Symphony No. 9
BRAHMS	Symphony No. 3, in F major
RAFF	Symphony, "Im Walde"
DVORAK	Symphony, "From the New World"
TSCHAIKOWSKY (First time.)	Italian Caprice
RIMSKY KORSAKOFF (First time.)	Three movements from the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"
MASSENET (First time.)	Suite, "Les Erinnyes"
CHABRIER (First time.)	Symphonic Poem, "Espagna"
BERLIOZ	Three movements from "The Damnation of Faust"
WEBER-WEINGARTNER	"Invitation to Dance"
BEETHOVEN	Overture, "Lenore, No. 3"
BERLIOZ	Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"
BRAHMS	Academic Overture
TSCHAIKOWSKY	Overture, "1812"
WAGNER	Selection

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND